> We took the government away. We stuffed ballot boxes. We shot them. We are not ashamed of it. The Senator from Wisconsin would have done the same thing. I see it in his eye right now. He would have done it. With that system—force, tissue ballots, etc.—we got tired ourselves. So we called a constitutional convention, and we eliminated, as I said, all of the colored people whom we could under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments.
> I want to call your attention to the remarkable change that has come over the spirit of the dream of the Republicans; to remind you gentlemen from the North that your slogans of the past—brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God—have gone glimmering down the ages. The brotherhood of man exists no longer, because you shoot negroes in Illinois, when they come in competition with your labor, as we shoot them in South Carolina when they come in competition with us in the matter of elections. You do not love them any better than we do. You used to pretend that you did, but you no longer pretend it except to get their votes.
> You deal with the Filipinos just as we deal with the negroes, only you treat them a heap worse.—Congressional Record, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, pages 2244, 2245.

In England an issue can be made up on one question. Men go from party to party in Parliament; if the Government be defeated, the ministry resign, the question is settled, and the new ministry is displaced again when it is beaten on some other important issue.

With us, we have a system of periodicity. The President is put in power for four years, the majority in the House for two years, and the majority in the Senate can never be changed in less than two years, and ordinarily the process takes at least six. So you have to determine not whether the President, or the Senators, or the Representatives be right on a single question; you must choose between the forces arrayed on one side or the other, and determine which you will trust with government on all questions for an indefinite or at least a long future.

Now, I do not wish to speak unkindly of our Democratic antagonists. Toleration comes with age and experience. I am glad to recognize cheerfully the patriotic purpose and the manly qualities of so many of the leaders the Democratic States of the South have contributed of late to the public service.

But I can not forget that the main power in the Democratic party still abides with the combinations of men who govern the cities of New York and of Chicago; with the men who are believers in what seems to me a dishonest currency, and in a policy that would bring distress and poverty into the homes of millions of American workmen; the men who would undermine the Supreme Court, and the men who would destroy the safeguards of property.

I can not see, in Mr. Bryan in the Presidential chair and the Senate and Congress so controlled, either hope that this policy of imperialism will be abandoned or that any good can come which will compensate us for the great evil such a rule will bring with it. I am not ready to take the administration of this country from the party which for fifty years has been wrong but once, and commit it to the party which for fifty years has never once been right.

Mr. TILLMAN. Not even on the Philippines?

Mr. HOAR. So far.

I believe that, if not to-day or to-morrow, yet at an early day, better knowledge of the facts, the light of experience, the love of liberty and justice which still burns in the hearts of the Republican masses in this country, will bring that party back to the principles and policy upon which it planted itself in the beginning.

No, Mr. President. If we subjugate the Filipinos we are, if you have your way, to govern 10,000,000 people in the East and nearly another million in the West Indies without any constitutional restraint. There will be under the flag 20,000,000 of other races, black men at home and brown men abroad, for whom it bears no star of hope. I do not see my way clear to hand them over to Mr. Bryan, in the Executive chair, and the Senators from Alabama and South Carolina, in the Senate, or to the party of which, beyond all question, they are to be most powerful and conspicuous leaders.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. I am informed that the Senator requested in the opening of his speech that he be not interrupted. If he does not wish to be interrupted now, I shall not intrude upon him.

Mr. HOAR. No. I am suffering with the disorder that is now so prevalent, and I very much doubt whether I shall be able to conclude my speech. If I have misrepresented the Senator in any way, I will yield for an interruption, otherwise I shall proceed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Under the circumstances, Mr. President, I shall not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I believe I have said nothing of the Senator except to read his language.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator, however, continued to allude to the Senator from South Carolina in a manner that would warrant interruption and controversy, but I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have alluded to the Senator from South Carolina only to say, in addition to quoting his language, that he was beyond all question hereafter to be one of the most powerful and conspicuous leaders of the Democratic party. I take it the Senator does not deem that an aspersion.

I believe, Mr. President, not only that perseverance in this policy will be the abandonment of the principles upon which our Government is founded, that it will change our Republic into an empire, that our methods of legislation, of diplomacy, of administration must hereafter be those which belong to empires, and not those which belong to republics; but I believe persistence in this attempt will result in the defeat and overthrow of the Republican party. That defeat may not come this year, or next year. I pray God it may never come. I well remember when the old Whig party, in the flush of delirium and anticipated triumph, gave up the great doctrines which it had so often avowed, and undertook to abandon the great territory between the Mississippi and the Pacific to its fate. It held its convention at Philadelphia. It selected as its candidate a great military chieftain. Amid the tempest and delirium a quiet delegate from my own State arose and declared to the convention that the Whig party was dead. It seemed that a more audacious, a more foolish, a more astounding utterance never fell upon human ears. And what was the result? The party carried the country and elected its President. But within less than four years thereafter Daniel Webster, as he lay dying at Marshfield, said, "The Whig party as a political organization is gone; and it is well." Let no such fate attend the Republican party. In my judgment, if not now, it will retrace its steps in time.

The practical question which divided the American people last year, and which divides them to-day, is this: Whether in protecting the people of the Philippine Islands from the ambition and cupidity of other nations we are bound to protect them from our own.

Edward Everett concludes that masterpiece of consummate oratory, his address on the character of Washington:

> Let us make a national festival and holiday of his birthday; and ever as the 22d of February returns let us remember that while with these solemn and joyous rites of observance we celebrate the great anniversary, our fellow-citizens on the Hudson, on the Potomac, from the Southern plains to the Western lakes, are engaged in the same offices of gratitude and love. Nor we, nor they alone. Beyond the Ohio, beyond the Mississippi, along that stupendous trail of immigration from the East to the West, which, bursting into States as it moves westward, is already threading the Western prairies, swarming through the portals of the Rocky Mountains and winding down their slopes, the name and the memory of Washington on that gracious night will travel with the silver queen of heaven through sixty degrees of longitude, nor part company with her till she walks in her brightness through the Golden Gate of California and passes serenely on to hold midnight court with her Australian stars. There and there only, in barbarous archipelagos, as yet untrodden by civilized man, the name of Washington is unknown; and there, too, when they swarm with enlightened millions, new honors shall be paid with ours to his memory.

The time which the orator predicted came. In that Eastern archipelago, no longer the home of barbarism, a people had achieved their independence and thrown off the yoke of centuries. They were longing for civilization, education, and liberty. To the millions, with which that land is swarming, in the dawning of a new light the name of Washington has become familiar. But, alas, the people are citing his example to protect their own liberties against his countrymen. They are nearly threefold in number the people to whom his Farewell Address was delivered. Pray to God that that revered and beautiful character, our shield so often against distempered folly and unhallowed ambition, may be theirs also.

In dealing with this question, Mr. President, I do not mean to enter upon any doubtful ground. I shall advance no proposition ever seriously disputed in this country till within twelve months. I shall cite no authority that is not by the common consent of all parties and all men of all shades of opinion recognized as among the very weightiest in jurisprudence and in the conduct of the State. I shall claim nothing as fact which is not abundantly proven by the evidence of the great commanders who conducted this war; by evidence coming from the President and the heads of department, or persons for whose absolute trustworthiness these authorities vouch.

If to think as I do in regard to the interpretation of the Constitution; in regard to the mandates of the moral law or the law of nations, to which all men and all nations must render obedience; in regard to the policies which are wisest for the conduct of the State, or in regard to those facts of recent history in the light of which we have acted or are to act hereafter, be treason, then Washington was a traitor; then Jefferson was a traitor; then Jackson was a traitor; then Franklin was a traitor; then Sumner was a traitor; then Lincoln was a traitor; then Webster was a traitor; then Clay was a traitor; then Corwin was a traitor; then Kent was a traitor; then Seward was a traitor; then McKinley, within two years, was a traitor; then the Supreme Court of the United States has been in the past a nest and hotbed of treason; then the people of the United States, for more than a century, have been traitors to their own flag and their own Constitution.

We are presented with an issue that can be clearly and sharply stated as a question of constitutional power, a question of international law, a question of justice and righteousness, or a question of public expediency. This can be stated clearly and sharply in the abstract, and it can be put clearly and sharply by an illustration growing out of existing facts.

The constitutional question is: Has Congress the power, under our Constitution, to hold in subjection unwilling vassal States?

The question of international law is: Can any nation rightfully convey to another sovereignty over an unwilling people who have thrown off its dominion, asserted their independence, established a government of their own, over whom it has at the time no practical control, from whose territory it has been disseized, and which it is beyond its power to deliver?

The question of justice and righteousness is: Have we the right to crush and hold under our feet an unwilling and subject people whom we had treated as allies, whose independence we are bound in good faith to respect, who had established their own free government, and who had trusted us?

The question of public expediency is: Is it for our advantage to promote our trade at the cannon's mouth and at the point of the bayonet?

All these questions can be put in a way of practical illustration by inquiring whether we ought to do what we have done, are doing, and mean to do in the case of Cuba; or what we have done, are doing, and some of you mean to do in the case of the Philippine Islands.

It does not seem to me to be worth while to state again at length the constitutional argument which I have addressed to the Senate heretofore. It has been encountered with eloquence, with clearness and beauty of statement, and, I have no doubt, with absolute sincerity by Senators who have spoken upon the other side. But the issue between them and me can be summed up in a sentence or two, and if, so stated, it can not be made clear to any man's apprehension, I despair of making it clear by any elaboration or amplification.

I admit that the United States may acquire and hold property, and may make rules and regulations for its disposition.

I admit that, like other property, the United States may acquire and hold land. It may acquire it by purchase. It may acquire it by treaty. It may acquire it by conquest. And it may make rules and regulations for its disposition and government, however it be acquired.

When there are inhabitants upon the land so acquired it may make laws for their government. But the question between me and the gentlemen on the other side is this: Is this acquisition of territory, of land or other property, whether gained by purchase, conquest, or treaty, a constitutional end or only a means to a constitutional end? May you acquire, hold, and govern territory or other property as an end for which our Constitution was framed, or is it only a means toward some other and further end? May you acquire, hold, and govern property by conquest, treaty, or purchase for the sole object of so holding and governing it, without the consideration of any further constitutional purpose? Or must you hold it for a constitutional purpose only, such as the making of new States, the national defense and security, the establishment of a seat of government, or the construction of forts, harbors, and like works, which, of course, are themselves for the national defense and security?

I hold that this acqusition, holding, and governing can be only a means for a constitutional end—the creation of new States or some other of the constitutional purposes to which I have adverted. And I maintain that you can no more hold and govern territory than you can hold and manage cannon or fleets for any other than a constitutional end; and I maintain that the holding in subjection an alien people, governing them against their will for any fancied advantage to them, is not only not an end provided for by the Constitution, but is an end prohibited therein.

Now, with due respect to the gentlemen who have discussed this matter, I do not find that they have answered this propostion or undertaken to answer it. I do not find that they have understood it. You have, in my judgment, under your admitted power to acquire, own, and govern territory, which is just like your admitted power to govern, own, and control ships or guns, no more right under the Constitution to hold that territory for the sake of keeping in subjection an alien people than you have a right to acquire, hold, and manage cannon or fleets or to raise armies for the sake of keeping in subjection and under your control an alien people. All these things are means; and means to constitutional and not to unconstitutional ends.

The Constitution of the United States sets forth certain specific objects and confers certain specific powers upon the Government it creates. All powers necessary or reasonably convenient to accomplishing these specific objects and exercising these specific powers are granted by implication. In my judgment the Constitution should be liberally construed in determining the extent of such powers. In that I agree with Webster and Hamilton and Lincoln and Washington and Marshall, and not with Calhoun or the Democrats of the time of the war of the rebellion and since. But the most liberal statesman or jurist never went further than the rule I have stated in claiming constitutional powers for our Government. The Constitution says that Congress may make rules and regulations for the government of the territory and other property of the United States. That implies that we may acquire and regulate territory as we may acquire and use other property, such as our ships of war, our cannon or forts or arsenals. But territory, like other property, can only be acquired for constitutional purposes, and can not be acquired and governed for unconstitutional purposes. Now, one constitutional purpose is to admit new States to the Union. That is one of the objects for which the Constitution was framed. So we may acquire and hold and govern territory with that object in view. But governing subject peoples, and holding them for that purpose, is not a constitutional end. On the contrary, it is an end which the generation which framed the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence declared was unrighteous and abhorrent. So, in my opinion, we have no constitutional power to acquire territory for the purpose of holding it in subjugation, in a state of vassalage or serfdom, against the will of its people.

It is to be noted just here that we have acquired no territory or other property in the Philippine Islands, save a few public buildings. By every other acquisition of territory the United States became a great land owner. She owned the public lands as she had owned the public lands in the Northwest ceded to her by the old States. But you own nothing in the Philippines. The people own their farms and dwellings and cities. The religious orders own the rest. The Filipinos desire to do what our English ancestors did in the old days when England was Catholic. The laity feared that the Church would engross all the land. So they passed their statute of mortmain. You have either got to let the people of the Philippine Islands settle this matter for themselves, or you must take upon you the delicate duty of settling it for them. Your purchase or conquest is a purchase or conquest of nothing but sovereignty. It is a sovereignty over a people who are never to be admitted to exercise it or to share it.

In the present case we have not, I repeat, bought any property. We have undertaken to buy mere sovereignty. There were no public lands in the Philippine Islands, the property of Spain, which we have bought and paid for. The mountains of iron and the nuggets of gold and the hemp-bearing fields—do you purpose to strip the owners of their rightful title? We have undertaken to buy allegiance, pure and simple. And allegiance is just what the law of nations declares you can not buy. The power of Congress to dispose of the territory or other property of the United States, invoked in this debate, as the foundation of your constitutional right, may carry with it in a proper case a right to the allegiance of the occupant of the soil we own. But we have not bought any property there. The mountains of iron, the nuggets of gold, the hemp-bearing fields, the tobacco and sugar and coffee are not ours, unless holding first that we can buy of Spain an allegiance which this people have shaken off, which Spain could not deliver, which does not exist in justice or in right, we can then go on and say that the Constitution of the United States does not apply to territory, and that we will proceed to take the private property of this people for public use, without their consent.

It is understood that the Filipino people purpose to dispossess the religious orders of their vast real estate possessions. They are Catholics. But they desire to do what Catholic England did long before the Reformation—preventing the engrossment by the church of vast and valuable lands needed by the people. As I understand it, our treaty binds us to confirm those titles, and that is one of the things which has provoked this people to their desperate resistance. Upon the question of the justice of their demand I do not purpose now to enter.

Whether the inestimable and imperishable principles of human liberty are to be trampled down by the American Republic, and whether its great bulwark and fortress, the American Constitution, impregnable from without, is to be betrayed from within, is our question now.

Will any gentleman affirm that the framers of the Constitution, or the people who adopted it, considered as an object and end of their government of limited powers which the Declaration of Independence had declared beyond the just powers of any government and contrary to natural right? Alexander Hamilton says the Declaration of Independence is the fundamental constitution of every State.

I have been unable to find a single reputable authority more than twelve months old for the power now claimed for Congress to govern dependent nations or territories not expected to become States. The contrary, until this war broke out, has been taken as too clear for reasonable question. I content myself with a few authorities. Among them are Daniel Webster, William H. Seward, the Supreme Court of the United States, James Madison.

Daniel Webster said in the Senate March 23, 1848:

> Arbitrary governments may have territories and distant possessions, because arbitrary governments may rule them by different laws and different systems. We can do no such thing. They must be of us, part of us, or else strangers. I think I see a course adopted which is likely to turn the Constitution of the land into a deformed monster, into a curse rather than a blessing; in fact, a frame of an unequal government, not founded on popular representation, not founded on equality, but on the grossest inequality; and I think that this process will go on, or that there is danger that it will go on, until this Union shall fall to pieces. I resist it, to-day and always! Whoever falters or whoever flies, I continue the contest!

James Madison said in the Federalist:

> The object of the Federal Constitution is to secure the union of the thirteen primitive States, which we know to be practicable; and to add to them such other States as may arise in their own bosoms, or in their neighborhood, which we can not doubt will be practicable.—James Madison, Federalist, No. 14.

William H. Seward said:

> It is a remarkable feature of the Constitution of the United States that its framers never contemplated colonies, or provinces, or territories at all. On the other hand, they contemplated States only, nothing less than States, perfect States, equal States, as they are called here, sovereign States. * * * There is reason—there is sound political wisdom in this provision of the Constitution excluding colonies, which are always subject to oppression, and excluding provinces, which always tend to corrupt and ultimately to break down the parent State.—Seward's Works, Volume 1, page 122.
> By the Constitution of the United States, there are no subjects. Every citizen of any one State is a free and equal citizen of the United States. Again, by the Constitution of the United States there are no permanent provinces or dependencies.—Seward's Works, Volume 4, page 167.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Fleming vs. Page, said:

> The genius and character of our institutions are peaceful; and the power to declare war was not conferred upon Congress for the purposes of aggression or aggrandizement, but to enable the Government to vindicate by arms, if it should become necessary, its own rights and the rights of its citizens. A war, therefore, declared by Congress, can never be presumed to be waged for the purpose of conquest or the acquisition of territory; nor does the law declaring the war imply an authority to the President to enlarge the limits of the United States by subjugating the enemy's country.

Our Territories, so far, have all been places where Americans would go to dwell as citizens, to establish American homes, to obtain honorable employment, and to build a State. Will any man go to the Philippine Islands to dwell, except to help govern the people, or to make money by a temporary residence? The men of the Philippines, under the Constitution and the existing laws, may become your fellow-citizens. You will never consent, in the sense of a true citizenship, to become theirs.

Mr. President, our friends who take another view of this question like to tell us of the mistakes of great men of other days, who have vainly protested against acquisition of territory. One worthy and most exuberant gentleman in another place points out to his hearers the folly of Webster and Clay, the delusions of Charles Sumner, and contrasts them with the wisdom of Jefferson and Tyler and Polk. Mr. Jefferson declared that the acquisition of Louisiana was unconstitutional, and wanted a constitutional amendment to justify it. I think the general sense of the American people is that in that particular Mr. Jefferson was in error, and that our power to admit new States clearly involves the power to acquire territory from which new States are to be made. I wonder, however, if there be any man now alive, who now holds or who ever did or ever will hold a seat in either House of Congress, willing to say that, having taken an oath to support the Constitution, he would, for any purpose of public advantage, forswear himself for the sake of a real or fancied good to his country. I hope and believe that the spirit of Fletcher of Saltoun, who said he would die to serve Scotland, but he would not do a base thing to save her, is still the spirit of American statesmanship. That exuberant gentleman contrasts the statesmanship of Polk and Tyler with that of Daniel Webster and Henry Clay and Charles Sumner. Somehow or other, the names of Webster and Clay and Sumner live in the hearts and on the lips of their countrymen, while the men who brought on the Mexican War in the interest of slavery are forgotten. I do not think we hear of men building statues to those counselors, or celebrating their birthdays, or writing their lives. In all generations, the statesmen who have appealed to righteousness and justice and freedom have left an enduring place in the loving memory of their countrymen, while the men who have counseled them to walk in the path of injustice and wrong, even if it led to empire and even if they were in the majority in their own day, are forgotten and despised. Ah, Mr. President, that gentleman says we are the anointed of the Lord, as the Jews were the anointed of the Lord. But the Jewish empire is forgotten. The sands of the desert cover the foundations of her cities. The spider spins its thread, the owl makes its midnight perch in their palaces. But still those little words, "Thou shalt not steal; thou shalt not covet that that is thy neighbor's; whatever ye would that men shall do to you, do ye even so again unto them," shine through the ages, blazing and undimmed. Mr. President, you may speculate; you may refine; you may doubt; you may deny. But the one foremost action in our history, the foremost action in all history, is the writing upon its pages those simple and sublime opening sentences of the Declaration of Independence. And the men who stand by it shall live in the eternal memory of mankind; and the men who depart from it, however triumphant and successful in their little policies, shall perish and be forgotten, or shall be remembered only to be despised.

When hostilities broke out, February 5, 1899, we had no occupancy of and no title of any kind to any portion of the Philippine territory, except the town and bay of Manila. Everything else was in the peaceful possession of the inhabitants. In such a condition of things, Mr. President, international law speaks to us with its awful mandate. It pronounces your proposed action sheer usurpation and robbery. You have no better title, according to the law of nations, to reduce this people to subjection than you have to subjugate Mexico or Haiti or Belgium or Switzerland.

FORBIDDEN BY INTERNATIONAL LAW.

This is the settled doctrine, as declared by our own great masters of jurisprudence.

You have no right, according to the law of nations, to obtain by purchase or acquisition sovereignty over a people which is not actually exercised by the country which undertakes to convey it or yield it.

It is a familiar principle of the common law that you can not make a lawful purchase of land, of which the seller is disseized, or of a chattel of which he is dispossessed. The reason of this doctrine is to prevent the purchase of lawsuits. This rule applies with tenfold force to undertaking to purchase human beings when their country and the selling power is dispossessed at the time of the sale, and where the title can only be enforced by war.

We have not yet completed the acquisition. But at the time we entered upon it, and at the time of this alleged purchase, the people of the Philippine Islands, as appears by General Otis's report, by Admiral Dewey's report, and the reports of officers for whom they vouched, held their entire territory, with the exception of the single town of Manila. They had, as appears from these reports, a full organized government. They had an army fighting for independence, admirably disciplined, according to the statement of zealous advocates of expansion.

Why, Mr. President, is it credible that any American statesman, that any American Senator, that any intelligent American citizen anywhere, two years ago could have been found to affirm that a proceeding like that of the Paris treaty could give a just and valid title to sovereignty over a people situated as were the people of those islands? A title of Spain, originally by conquest, never submitted to nor admitted by the people of the islands, with frequent insurrections at different times for centuries, and then the yoke all thrown off, a constitutional government, schools, colleges, churches, universities, hospitals, town governments, a legislature, a cabinet, courts, a code of laws, and the whole island occupied and controlled by its people, with the single exception of one city; with taxes lawfully levied and collected, with an army and the beginning of a navy.

And yet the Senate, the Congress enacted less than two years ago that the people of Cuba—controlling peaceably no part of their island, levying no taxes in any orderly or peaceable way, with no administration of justice, no cabinet—not only of right ought to be, but were, in fact, a free and independent State. I did not give my assent to that declaration of fact. I assented to the doctrine that they of right ought to be. But I thought the statement of fact much calculated to embarrass the Government of the United States, if it were bound by that declaration; and it has been practically disregarded by the Administration ever since. But the question now is a very different one. You not only deny that the Filipinos are, but you deny that they of right ought to be free and independent; and you recognize Spain as entitled to sell to you the sovereignty of an island where she was not at the time occupying a foot of territory, where her soldiers were held captives by the government of the island, a government to which you had delivered over a large number of Spanish prisoners to be held as captives. And yet you come here to-day and say that they not only are not, but they of right ought not to be free and independent; and when you are pressed you answer us by talking about mountains of iron and nuggets of gold, and trade with China.

I affirm that you can not get by conquest, and you can not get by purchase, according to the modern law of nations, according to the law of nations as accepted and expounded by the United States, sovereignty over a people, or title to a territory, of which the power that undertakes to sell it or the power from whom you undertake to wrest it has not the actual possession and dominion. Under municipal law you can not buy a horse of which the seller is dispossessed; you can not buy a foot of land of which he is disseized. You can not purchase a lawsuit. Under international law you can not buy a people from a power that has no actual dominion over them. You can not buy a war. More than this, you can not buy a tyrant's claim to subject again an oppressed people who have achieved their freedom.

You can not buy the liberties of a people from a dispossessed tyrant, liberties they have bravely won for themselves in arms. You can not buy sovereignty like merchandise and men like sheep. The King of England kept, down to 1800, the title of Duke of Normandy and King of France. Could any other country or all Europe together have bought France of King George? I wonder what would have happened if, instead of acknowledging our independence, any time before the French treaty France had bought England out and undertaken to assert her title to the United States. These questions have to be answered, not amid the shouting and applause of a political campaign, not in party platforms, not alone in a single campaign or a single generation. They have got to be answered to history, to the instructed conscience of the civilized world, when the passions and the greed and the ambitions of a single generation have gone by and are cold. And there will be to them but one answer.

I shall show beyond all question or cavil, from the evidence of our own commanders, that this was a people. They were a people who had taken arms for liberty. They had achieved liberty. They had taken arms to establish a republic. They had established a republic—the first republic of the Orient.

Now, international law has something to say about this matter. Will the American people, for the first time in their history, disregard its august mandates?

You gentlemen who desire to hold on to the Philippine Islands are trying to plant the United States squarely upon this doctrine. You must affirm that a people rising for their own liberties against a tyrant, and having got actual possession of their own territory, and having dispossessed the oppressor, have no rightful title thereto.

Not only are we violating our own Constitution, and the great precepts of the Declaration of Independence which, as the Supreme Court of the United States have declared, is to control and interpret, being, as the Court say, but the letter of which the Declaration of Independence is the spirit, but we are equally violating the accepted precepts of the law of nations as expounded by our own great authorities.

If there be one thing above others which is the glory of the American Republic it is the respect and obedience it has ever paid to international law. It is that law, the product of Christianity which prevents every weak nation on the earth from becoming the prey of the stronger ones. It is to nations what the conscience is to the individual soul. It finds its enforcement and sanction in the public opinion of the civilized world, a power, according to Mr. Webster, stronger than armies or navies. No nation escapes the penalty of its infraction. As Mr. Webster says, it pursues the conqueror to the very scene of his ovation and wounds him with the sting that belongs to the consciousness of having outraged the opinion of mankind.

The late Secretary of State, Mr. Day, the head of the commission that negotiated the treaty at Paris, has quite lately publicly disclaimed any title to the Philippine Archipelago by conquest. I think, although there have been some hasty statements to that effect, the theory of title by conquest will find few advocates in this chamber. It is a theory opposed alike to all the traditions of the Republic and to all the mandates of morality.

Mr. Justice Gray says, in his opinion in the case of The Paquete Habana and The Lola (U. S. Rep., vol. 175):

> International law is part of our law, and must be ascertained and administered by the courts of justice of appropriate jurisdiction, as often as questions of right depending upon it are duly presented for their determination.
> Such works are resorted to by judicial tribunals, not for the speculations of their authors concerning what the law ought to be, but for trustworthy evidence of what the law really is.—Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U. S., 113, 163, 164, 214, 215.
> They are witnesses of the sentiments and usages of civilized nations, and the weight of their testimony increases every time that their authority is invoked by statesmen, and every year that passes without the rules laid down in their works being impugned by the avowal of contrary principles.—Wheaton's International Law (8th edition), section 15.
> In cases where the principal jurists agree, the presumption will be very great in favor of the solidity of their maxims; and no civilized nation that does not arrogantly set all ordinary law and justice at defiance will venture to disregard the uniform sense of the established writers on international law.—1 Kent Com., 18.

Our fathers used to think John Locke pretty good authority in the ethics of freedom. Bacon, and Newton, and Locke still hold their place as the greatest of English philosophers. You will find him cited pretty often in the great debates that preceded the Revolution and the discussions when our national and State constitutions were set up. This is what he says:

> Over those, then, that joined with him in the war, and over those of the subdued country that opposed him not, and the posterity even of those that did, the conqueror, even in a just war, hath, by his conquest, no right of dominion; they are free from any subjection to him, and if their former government be dissolved, they are at liberty to begin and erect another to themselves.
> The conqueror, it is true, usually by the force he has over them, compels them, with the sword at their breast, to stoop to his conditions, and submit to such a government as he pleased to afford them; but the inquiry is, what right has he to do so? If it be said they submit by their own consent, then this allows their own consent to be necessary to give the conqueror a title to rule over them. It remains only to be considered whether promises extorted by force without right can be thought consent, and how far they bind. To which I shall say, they bind not at all; because whatsoever another gets from me by force, I still retain the right of, and he is obliged presently to restore.—Locke on Civil Government, part 2, sections 185, 196.

Now, Mr. President, is there any truth in this? Is this a revolutionary pronunciamento or is it doctrine to which—whatever monarchial governments may have to say—the American people are committed by all their traditions and by all their history?

From many authorities I will cite a few.

First. President McKinley, in the language so often quoted. When the President said that—

> Forcible annexation, according to our American code of morals, would be criminal aggression—was he a copperhead? Was he disloyal to the flag? Was not he Republican? Was there ever an utterance so calculated to give courage to Aguinaldo and his people as that?

When he said—

> Human rights and constitutional privileges must not be forgotten in the race for wealth and commercial supremacy. The government of the people must be by the people and not by a few of the people. It must rest upon the free consent of the governed and all of the governed. Power, it must be remembered, which is secured by oppression or usurpation or by any form of injustice is soon dethroned. We have no right in law or morals to usurp that which belongs to another, whether it is property or power—was he a traitor?

I suppose Chancellor Kent is recognized everywhere as the ablest American writer of jurisprudence, unless some of us were to agree with Kent himself, in assigning the superiority to Story. Judge Kent's language, which I myself have quoted elsewhere, has been quoted already more than once in this debate. He says:

> Full sovereignty can not be held to have passed by the mere words of the treaty without actual delivery. To complete the right of property, the right to the thing and the possession of the thing must be united. This is a necessary principle in the law of property in all systems of jurisprudence. * * *
> This general law of property applies to the right of territory no less than to other rights. The practice of nations has been conformable to this principle, and the conventional law of nations is full of instances of this kind. (Page 178.)

The same doctrine is stated by Halleck, International Law, vol. 2, p. 472, and by Phillimore Commentaries upon International Law, vol. 3, p. 871.

Halleck says:

> The rule of public law, with respect to the allegiance of the inhabitants of a conquered territory, is no longer to be interpreted as meaning that it is absolutely and unconditionally acquired by conquest, or transferred and handed over by treaty, as a thing assignable by contract, and without the assent of the subject. On the contrary, the express or implied consent of the subject is now regarded as essential to a complete new allegiance."

Sumner said in his speech before the Republican State convention of Massachusetts in 1869:

> And he knows our country little, and little also of that great liberty of ours, who supposes that we could receive such a transfer. On each side there is impossibility. Territory may be conveyed, but not a people.

Next. Shurston Baker, whose admirable treatise on international law has just been published in Boston. He says:

> In modern times sales and transfers of national territory to another power can only be made by treaty or some solemn act of the sovereign authority of the state. And such transfers of territory do not include the allegiance of its inhabitants without their consent, express or implied.

At page 355 the same author says:

> The rule of public law with respect to the allegiance of the inhabitants of a conquered territory is therefore no longer to be interpreted as meaning that it is absolutely and unconditionally acquired by conquest, or transferred and handed over by a treaty as a thing assignable by contract and without the assent of the subject. On the contrary, the express or implied assent of the subject is now regarded as essential to a complete new allegiance.
> If the inhabitants of the ceded conquered territory choose to leave it on its transfer and to adhere to their former sovereign, they have, in general, a right to do so.
> The status of the inhabitants of the conquered and transferred territory is thus determined by their own choice.
> In the cases arising out of the Revolution by which the North American colonies of Great Britain became an independent state it was considered to be an established maxim of public and international law that there was vested in an individual a right of electing to remain under the old or of contracting a new allegiance. The choice must be made within a reasonable period of time.
> In order to make a transfer of property valid, the authority, whether de facto or de jure, must be competent to bind the state. Hence the necessity of examining into and ascertaining the powers of the rulers, as the municipal constitutions of different states throw many difficulties in the way of alienations of their public property, and particularly of their territory. Especially, in modern times, the consent of the governed, express or implied, is necessary before the transfer of their allegiance can regularly take place.

But why multiply citations to a Senate who, within two years, affirmed that Cuba of right ought to be free and independent, and to a Congress and a President that declared war to make that declaration good? You were stating a doctrine of public law, were you not? You were not uttering a lying revolutionary pronunciamento. You were speaking for a great nation, on a solemn occasion. You were speaking words of truth and soberness, words you meant to make good with the lives of your sons. The first and the last declaration of public law ever made by the American people, the declaration of 1776 and the declaration of 1898, are in full accord and harmony. They both justify the Philippine people and condemn us.

I know that in that archipelago of 1,200 islands there are many tribes and races. There are wild men, pagans, who probably never heard of Spain. There are islands over which Spain never exercised power. There are Mahometans, polygamists ruled by a sultan, whose polygamous despotism we are now supporting. We can buy our peace with him, although we can not even treat for peace with the men whom our military commanders promised independence. But I am pleading for that Christian people who won their freedom from Spain and established free government over Luzon and the Visayas, a goverment as stable and unquestioned as that of any American State during our Revolution.

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

The Declaration of Independence is not so much a declaration of rights as a declaration of duties. It prescribes a rule of conduct for men in the same state to one another and for the nations of the earth to one another. Like the golden rule, it makes the law of individual right the law also of individual duty. Do Senators reflect how this "imperialism," as they call it, is inaugurating a revolution not only in the law of nations, not only in the fundamental law by which the people of the United States have governed themselves until now, not only in the interpretation of the Constitution, but in the moral law itself? As I hear the utterances of some worthy gentlemen taking the name of God upon their lips, it seems to me as if they thought the balance of the universe itself had changed within this year, and that God had gone over to the side of Satan.

There is one question I should like to put to the Republican majority in the Senate and to the Republican party in the country: Is this doctrine true or is it false? Are you to stand on it any longer or are you going to whistle it down the wind?

Thomas Jefferson declared it, this precise doctrine now at stake here. John Quincy Adams reaffirmed it again and again. Abraham Lincoln said he was willing to be assassinated for it. Charles Sumner was almost assassinated for it in his place in the Senate Chamber. Republican national conventions in 1856 and in 1860 and in later years have reaffirmed it again and again. President McKinley, two years ago, made the most extreme statement of it to be found in literature.

Now, either this thing is true or it is a lying pretense. If it be a lying pretense, the country has stood on a lie during its whole history. If it be true, the country is dishonored when we depart from it. For myself, I believe it is true; I have tried to live by it; I am contented to die by it; my love of country rests on it; my pride of ancestry rests on it. To me that is what the flag symbolizes and stands for.

I believe that utterance made at Philadelphia in 1776 to have been the greatest evangel that ever came to mankind since the story of Bethlehem. Like the shot fired at Concord, it was heard round the world. It was heard with fear in the palace of the tyrant; it was heard with joy in the huts where poor men dwelt. I reverently believe it was heard with joy in heaven itself.

I believe, also, that if the gloss put upon that great declaration by the Senator from Connecticut had been uttered then it would have been received with a burst of derisive laughter in hell, and Satan himself would have led the chorus.

We have had so far some fundamental doctrine, some ideals to to which this people has been devoted. Have you anything to give us in their place? You are trying to knock out the corner stones. Is there any material from your swamp and mud and morass from which you can make a new foundation for our temple?

Gentlemen tell us that the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin is copied from that introduced in Jefferson's time for the purchase of Louisiana. Do you claim that you propose to deal with these people as Jefferson meant to deal with Louisiana? You talk of Alaska, of Florida, of California; do you mean to deal with the Philippines as we mean to deal with Alaska and dealt with Florida or California?

It was safe to give Jefferson—who thought it wicked to govern a people against its will—a power with which gentlemen who think it is right ought never to be trusted.

I have spoken of the Declaration of Independence as a solemn affirmation of public law, but it is far more than that. It is a solemn pledge of national faith and honor. It is a baptismal vow. It is the bedrock of our republican institutions. It is, as the Supreme Court declared, the soul and spirit of which the Constitution is but the body and letter. It is the light by which the Constitution must be read. The statesman or the party who will not stand by the Declaration and obey it is never to be trusted anywhere to keep an oath to support the Constitution. To such a statesman, whenever his ambition or his passion shall incline him, to such a party, whenever its fancied advantage shall tempt it, there will be no constitutional restraint. It will bend the Constitution to its desire, never its desire to the Constitution. Constitutio ad causam accommodatur, non causa ad constitutionem.

There is expansion enough in it, but it is the expansion of freedom and not of depotism; of life, not of death. Never was such growth in all human history as that from the seed Thomas Jefferson planted. The parable of the mustard seed, than which, as Edward Everett said, "the burning pen of inspiration, ranging heaven and earth for a similitude, can find nothing more appropriate or expressive to which to liken the Kingdom of God," is repeated again. "Whereunto shall we liken it, or with what comparison shall we compare it? It is like a grain of mustard seed, which, when it is sown in the earth, is less than all the seeds that be in the earth.

"But when it is sown, it groweth up, and becometh greater than all herbs, and shooteth out great branches, so that the fowls of the air may lodge under the shadow of it." This is the expansion of Thomas Jefferson. It has covered the continent. It is on both the seas. It has saved South America. It is revolutionizing Europe. It is the expansion of freedom. It differs from your tinsel, pinchbeck, pewter expansion as the growth of a healthy youth into a strong man differs from the expansion of an anaconda when he swallows his victim. Ours is the expansion of Thomas Jefferson. Yours is the expansion of Aaron Burr. It is destined to as short a life and to a like fate.

Until within two years the American people have been wont to appeal to the Declaration of Independence as the foremost State paper in history. As the years go round the Fourth of July has been celebrated wherever Americans could gather together, at home or abroad. To have signed it, to an American, was better than a title of nobility. It was no passionate utterance of a hasty enthusiasm. There was nothing of the radical in it; nothing of Rousseau; nothing of the French Revolution. It was the sober utterance of the soberest men of the soberest generation that ever lived. It was the declaration of a religious people at the most religious period of their history. It was a declaration not merely of rights but of duties. It was an act not of revolution but of construction. It was the corner stone, the foundation stone of a great national edifice wherein the American people were to dwell forevermore. The language was the language of Thomas Jefferson. But the thought was the thought of every one of his associates. The men of the Continental Congress meant to plant their new nation on eternal verities which no man possessed by the spirit of liberty could ever thereafter undertake to challenge. As the Christian religion was rested by its author on two sublime commandments on which hang all the laws and the prophets, so these men rested republican liberty on two sublime verities on which it must stand, if it can stand at all; in which it must live or bear no life. One was the equality of the individual man with every other in political right. The other is that you are now seeking to overthrow—the right of every people to institute their own government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness, and so to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them. Equality of individual manhood and equality of individual states. This is the doctrine which the Republican party is now urged to deny.

To justify that denial the advocates of the policy of imperialism are driven to the strange affirmation that Thomas Jefferson did not believe it and contradicted it when he purchased Louisiana; that John Quincy Adams did not believe it and contradicted it when he bought Florida; that Abraham Lincoln did not believe it and contradicted it when he put down the rebellion; that Charles Sumner did not believe it and contradicted it when he bought Alaska. They say that because, with the full and practical consent of the men who occupied them, these men bought great spaces of territory occupied by sparse and scattered populations, neither owning it nor pretending to own it, not capable of occupying it or governing it, destitute of every single attribute which makes or can make a nation or a people, those statesmen of ours, designing to make the territory acquired into equal States, to be dwelt in and governed under our Constitution by men with rights equal to our own—that therefore you may get by purchase or by conquest an unwilling people, occupying and governing a thickly settled territory, possessing every attribute of a national life, enjoying a freedom they have themselves achieved; that you may crush out their national life; that you may overthrow their institutions; that you may strangle their freedom; that you may put over them governors whom you appoint and in whose appointment they have no voice; that you may make laws for them in your interest and not in theirs; that you may overthrow their republican liberty, and in doing this you appeal to the example of Thomas Jefferson and John Quincy Adams and Abraham Lincoln and Charles Sumner.

Thomas Jefferson comes down in history with the Declaration of Independence in one hand and the title deed of Louisiana in the other. Do you think his left hand knew not what his right hand did? Do you think these two immortal transactions contradicted each other? Do you think he bought men like sheep and paid for them in gold? It is true the men of the Declaration held slaves. Jefferson felt the inconsistency, and declared that he trembled for his country when he felt that God was just. But he lived and died in the expectation that the Declaration would abolish slavery, as it did.

In every accession of territory to this country ever made we recognized fully the doctrine of the consent of the governed and the doctrine that territory so acquired must be held to be made into States. The men who say that Jefferson violated the doctrine of the Declaration when he bought Louisiana, and John Quincy Adams when he acquired Florida, and Sumner when he made his great speech for Alaska, might, with as much reason, justify a rape by citing the precedent of every lawful marriage that has taken place since the beginning of time.

The confusion of the argument of our friends on the other side comes from confounding the statement in the Declaration of the rights of individuals with the statement of the rights of nations, or peoples, in dealing with one another.

The whole Declaration is a statement of political rights and political relations and political duties.

First. Every man is equal in political rights, including the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, to every other.

Second. No people can come under the government of any other people, or of any ruler, without its consent. The law of nature and of nature's God entitle every people to its separate and equal station among the powers of the earth. Our fathers were not dealing in this clause with the doctrine of the social compact; they were not considering the rights of minorities; they used the word "people" as equivalent to "nation," or "state," as an organized political being, and not as a mere aggregate of persons not collected or associated. They were not thinking of Robinson Crusoe in his desolate island, or of scattered settlers, still less of predatory bands roaming over vast regions they could neither own nor occupy. They were affirming the right of each of the thirteen colonies separately or of all together to throw off the yoke of George III and to separate itself or themselves from Great Britain. Now, you must either admit that what they said was true, or you must affirm the contrary.

The question is put, with an air of triumph, as if it were somehow hard to answer, If this doctrine of yours apply to a million men why does it not apply to a hundred men? At what point in the census do men get these God-given rights of yours? Well, the answer is easy enough. Our fathers, in the affirmation of the Declaration of Independence you are now denying, were speaking of the equal rights of nations, of their duties to each other. The exact point where a few scattered settlements become a people, or a few nomadic tribes a nation, may not admit of precise mathematical definition. At what point does a brook become a river? When does a pond become a lake, or a lake a sea, or a breeze a hurricane? You can not tell me. But surely there are nations and peoples, there is organized national life; and there are scattered habitations and wandering tribes to whom these titles are never applied. Louisiana, Florida, Alaska, New Mexico, California, neither had, nor did their inhabitants claim to have, such a national vitality when we acquired them. And if there were anything of that sort when we annexed them, it desired to come to us. And it came to us to become part of us—bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh, life of our life, soul of our soul.

But I can give you two pretty safe practical rules, quite enough for this day's purpose. Each of them will solve your difficulty, if you have a difficulty, and want to solve it. That is a people, that is a power of the earth, that is a nation entitled as such to its separate and equal station among the powers of the earth by the laws of nature and of nature's God, that has a written constitution, a settled territory, an independence it has achieved, an organized army, a congress, courts, schools, universities, churches, the Christian religion, a village life in orderly, civilized, self-governed municipalities; a pure family life, newspapers, books, statesmen who can debate questions of international law, like Mabini, and organize governments, like Aguinaldo; poets like José Rizal; aye, and patriots who can die for liberty, like José Rizal. The Boer republic is a nation, and it is a crime to crush out its life, though its population be less than that of Providence, R. I. Each one of our old thirteen States would have been a nation, even if it had stood alone. And the Philippine republic, with twenty times the number of the Boers, a people more than the whole thirteen States who joined in the Declaration put together, is a nation, and it is a greater crime still to crush out its life.

There is another rule that will help any Senator out of his difficulty. It must be a comfort to every one of you in his perplexity. Every people is of right entitled to its independence that has got as far as Cuba had in the spring of 1898. You all admit that. Admit! You all avow, affirm, strenuously insist on that. You will all pledge your lives and fortunes and sacred honor for that. You will go to war and send your sons to war to maintain that. If Spain shall deny it, or any other country but Great Britain, woe be to her. It isn't necessary, according to you, to have a constitution; it isn't necessary to have courts; it isn't necessary to have a capital; it isn't necessary to have a school. The seat of government may be in the saddle. It isn't necessary to occupy a city, or to have a seaport; it isn't necessary to hold permanently an acre of land; it isn't necessary to have got the invader out of the country; it isn't necessary to have a tenth part of the claim the Filipinos have, or to have done a tenth part of the things the Filipinos have done. You settled all this for yourselves and for the country long ago—March 10, 1898. So I assume you have only put this conundrum for the pleasure of answering it yourselves.

Mr. Jefferson estimates the population of Louisiana at the time of the purchase at 42,375, in his communication to Congress. Its area in square miles was 1,182,752, one person to 27 square miles. But Gayarre, the best recent authority, estimates the population at about 20,000, or less than one person to 50 square miles.

The population of Florida at the time of the annexation was about 30,000. At the first census thereafter, it was 34,725, making a little more than one inhabitant to 2 square miles.

A convention of the people of Florida petitioned for the protection of the United States as an integral part of the United States; and it is notorious that the inhabitants were eager for annexation.

In the case of Louisiana, the settlers at New Orleans objected. Those at St. Louis and the other ports were willing. But the settlers at New Orleans were, many of them, sojourners only, designing to return to France. And France, as Napoleon well knew, was totally unable to hold them against England.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will suspend a moment while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. HOAR. I have the authority of my colleague, who is in charge of the bill, to ask that the unfinished business be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection it will be so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, no man can read for a moment Mr. Sumner's great speech in executive session and claim that it is in the least a departure from the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence, or a precedent for the conquest or purchase of the Philippine Islands. Mr. Sumner declares that upon this region of more than 570,000 square miles, with 4,000 statute miles of coast, innumerable islands, and a coast line, including bays and islands, not less than 11,270 miles in length, there are but 54,000 inhabitants according to the most accurate estimate. He declares there is no government there; that Russia's control is but nominal; that in many maps of the Russian Empire the territory is not contained. Her government, he says, is little more than a name or a shadow. It is not even a skeleton. It is hardly visible. Its only representative is a fur company, to which has been added latterly an ice company. The immense country is without form and without light; without activity and without progress. Distant from the imperial capital and separated from the huge bulk of the Russian Empire, it does not share the vitality of a common country. Its life is solitary and feeble. Its settlements are only encampments or lodges. Its fisheries are only a petty perquisite belonging to local or personal adventurers rather than to the commerce of nations. He quotes Alexander Humboldt, who says: "The Russian factories on the American continent are, for the most part, mere collections of sheds and cabins, but serving as storehouses for the fur trade." Humboldt adds that we must not think that these places are Russian provinces in the sense given to the word in speaking of Spanish provinces.

The price, $7,500,000, paid for 570,000 square miles of territory shows that it was but a waste and desolate place, without national life; without a people in any true sense of the word; without any inhabitants possessing or claiming a title beyond their petty huts or temporary dwelling places. And, Mr. President, Mr. Sumner puts forward as the chief motive for acquiring Alaska the expansion of republican institutions, which, he says, is our traditional aspiration. It was in this spirit that independence was achieved, and that it is in the name of human rights, the same in which our fathers overthrew the kingly power, that this acquisition is to be made. He quotes John Adams, saying that our State governments are destined to spread over the northern part of this whole quarter of the globe. He adds that we are to guarantee a republican form of government to them, and that Russia is now, with France and Spain, giving way to the absorbing unity declared in the national motto, "E Pluribus Unum."

Mr. Sumner enters in his speech what he styles a "caveat." This treaty must not be a precedent for a system of indiscriminate and costly annexion. He says that every stage in our predestined future must be by natural processes, without war, and, he would add, even without purchase. Our triumph must be by growth and organic expansion, recognizing always the will of those who become our fellow-citizens. Our acquisitions, he says, will be under the sanction of wedlock to the Republic.

Mr. Sumner, as I said just now, estimated the population at 54,000, or one inhabitant to about 11 square miles, divided into four groups—Eskimo, Aleutians, who are of Mongolian origin; Kenaians and Koloschians, who are American Indians. Some of them are warlike; some gentle and pacific; all slaveholders; some cannibals. Mr. Sumner ends his speech with affirming "that we are to give to this territory republican government, which, looking to a long future, we shall organize with free schools and equal laws, before which every citizen will stand erect in the consciousness of manhood. Bestow such a government, and you will give what is better than all you can receive, whether quintals of fish, sands of gold, choicest fur, or most beautiful ivory."

In the case of Hawaii a constitution had been maintained in peace for five years, in spite of Mr. Cleveland's known inclination to interfere for its overthrow. There was an express provision authorizing the Government to make a treaty of annexation with us.

In the case of the provinces acquired from Mexico, there was no population capable of a separate national life, and there was at least no reason to believe that the people dissented.

But in the present case you have a clear, sharp question put to the conscience of the people: Will you by force of arms or by purchase get territory belonging to an unwilling people, numbering millions, for the purpose of holding them in subjugation forever—a people who had achieved their own independence, had a government established in order and in peace, who are so opposed to your rule that they are willing to die in an almost hopeless resistance to it?

I repeat. In every acquisition of territory we ever made we meant to make States of it. Jefferson expressly says so in his Louisiana message. There was no nation owning and dwelling on the territory; no people in the sense of the Declaration; no organized national life; and certainly, in every case but Louisiana, we had reason to believe that the few scattered dwellers in the territory approved the transaction.

Mr. Seward said of California:

California yielded to persuasion rather than to conquest. She renounced her lineage, language, and ancient loyalty.—Seward's Works, volume 1, page 9.

There are other arguments, if they are to be called arguments, which would hardly be deemed worthy of consideration were it not that they have been given a wide circulation by the imperialistic press.

One says, You imprison criminals, and therefore your Government does not rest upon the consent of the governed. Another says, You subdued the Southern rebellion, and therefore you govern people without their consent. In the case of the Southern rebellion, if all the people of any State, without distinction of color or race, had been counted, there was not one where the majority was not in favor of the Union. In the case of the Southern rebellion, the rebellion was by States against a Government which the insurgents had aided in establishing, and against the Constitution which they had declared should be the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any particular State to the contrary notwithstanding.

But it is hardly worth while to undertake to notice arguments which are not themselves addressed to the reason, and which I do not believe ever convince those who utter them, although sometimes in the excitement of crowded audiences they pass current with those who hear them.

You have tried governing men of other races than your own at home for a hundred years. You have dealt with the Indian, you have dealt with the negro, close at hand, knowing all about them. I suppose you feel encouraged by your success. There are 10,000,000 of them. And now you go forth to lay your yoke on 10,000,000 more, 7,000 miles away, of whom you know nothing. You go forth jauntily and boastingly, as Louis Napoleon went to meet his doom at Sedan.

AGUINALDO, BRAVE, HONEST, AND PATRIOTIC.

Senators, if there were no Constitution, if there were no Declaration, if there were no international law, if there were nothing but the history of the past two years, the American people would be bound in honor, if there be honor, bound in common honesty, if there be honesty, not to crush out this Philippine republic, and not to wrest from this people its independence. The history of our dealing with the Philippine people is found in the reports of our commanders. It is all contained in our official documents, and in published statements of General Anderson and in the speeches of the President. It is little known to the country to-day. When it shall be known, I believe it will cause a revolution in public sentiment.

There are 1,200 islands in the Philippine group. They extend as far as from Maine to Florida. They have a population variously estimated at from 8,000,000 to 12,000,000. There are wild tribes who never heard of Christ, and islands that never heard of Spain. But among them are the people of the island of Luzon, numbering 3,500,000, and the people of the Visayan Islands, numbering 2,500,000 more. They are a Christian and civilized people. They wrested their independence from Spain and established a republic. Their rights are no more to be affected by the few wild tribes in their own mountains or by the dwellers in the other islands than the rights of our old thirteen States were affected by the French in Canada, or the Six Nations of New York, or the Cherokees of Georgia, or the Indians west of the Mississippi. Twice our commanding generals, by their own confession, assured these people of their independence. Clearly and beyond all cavil we formed an alliance with them. We expressly asked them to cooperate with us. We handed over our prisoners to their keeping; we sought their help in caring for our sick and wounded. We were told by them again and again and again that they were fighting for independence. Their purpose was as well known to our generals, to the War Department, and to the President, as the fact that they were in arms. We never undeceived them until the time when hostilities were declared in 1899. The President declared again and again that we had no title and claimed no right to anything beyond the town of Manila. Hostilities were begun by us at a place where we had no right to be, and were continued by us in spite of Aguinaldo's disavowal and regret and offer to withdraw to a line we should prescribe. If we crush that republic, despoil that people of their freedom and independence, and subject them to our rule, it will be a story of shame and dishonor.

Is it right, is it just, to subjugate this people? To substitute our Government for their self-government, for the constitution they have proclaimed and established, a scheme of government such as we could devise 10,000 miles away?

Is it right to put over them officers whom we are to select and they are to obey and pay?

Is it right to make tariffs for our interests and not theirs?

Are the interests of the Manila tobacco grower to be decided upon hearings given to the tobacco raisers of the Connecticut River valley?

Are these mountains of iron, and nuggets of gold, and stores of coal, and hemp-bearing fields, and fruit-bearing gardens to be looked upon by our legislators with covetous eyes?

Is it our wealth or their wealth these things are to increase?

There are other pregnant questions, some of which perhaps require a little examination and a little study of the reports of our commanders.

Had they rightfully achieved their independence when hostilities began between us and them?

Did they forfeit their independence by the circumstances of the war?

On the whole, have they not shown that they are fit for self-government, fit as Cuba, fit as Greece, fit as Spain, fit as Japan, fit as Haiti or San Domingo, fit as any country to the south of us, from the Rio Grande to Cape Horn, was when, with our approval, those countries won their liberties from Spain?

Can we rightfully subjugate a people because we think them unfit for self-government?

Said Sir James Mackintosh when the partition of Poland was going on:

There is no political doctrine more false or pernicious than that which represents vice in its internal government as an extenuation of unjust aggression against a country and a consolation to mankind for the destruction of its independence. As no government is without great faults, such a doctrine multiplies the grounds of war, gives an unbounded scope to ambition, and furnishes benevolent pretexts for every sort of rapine.

The people of the Philippine Islands have never submitted themselves willingly to Spain. There has been no time for two centuries when they would not have been free from the yoke if they could. Their history has been a history of cruelty and oppression on one side, of resistance and the aspiration for freedom on the other.

In 1896 a rebellion broke out, headed by Aguinaldo. His people were unarmed and poor. The difficulty of communication in a country without roads made combination impossible against a power that commanded the sea and the seaports. Still, the revolt was formidable enough to compel Spain to make promises of reform and redress of grievances. Aguinaldo, seeing that a continued strife would cost much suffering, many lives, and in all likelihood defeat in the end, accepted Spain's promise of amendment and agreed that the principal leaders of the rebellion, their wives, widows, and children, should go into exile and that Spain should make some provision for their support.

Spain was faithless to her promise of reform and paid over only part of the money. This transaction has been much criticised here, but, in my judgment, it leaves no stain on the honesty or patriotism of the insurgent chief. There is no evidence that he profited himself by the transaction or expended a penny of the money for his own use. The transaction was, as circumstances then were, for the interest of his people.

Many advocates of imperialism who have investigated the matter have declared their confidence in Aguinaldo's integrity. Mr. Schurman, president of the commission, told his students at Cornell when he got home that Aguinaldo was an honest and a patriotic man. Our consuls bear this same testimony.

Mr. Williams, United States consul-general at Manila, under date of March 28, 1898, says:

Rebellion never more threatening to Spain. Rebels getting money, arms, and friends, and they outnumber the Spaniards a hundred to one.

March 21, 1898, he writes of the desertion of an entire regiment of the Spanish forces to the insurgents, and adds:

Now five thousand armed rebels, who for days have been in camp near Manila and have been reenforced from the mountains, plan to attack the city to-night.

On April 28, 1898, Mr. Pratt wrote a letter to Mr. Day, in which he speaks of "learning from General Aguinaldo the state and object sought to be obtained, which, though absent from the Philippines, he was directing."

Mr. Pratt further says in a letter to Secretary Day:

General Aguinaldo impressed me as a man of intellectual ability, courage, and worthy of the confidence that had been placed in him.

He says further:

No close observer of what has transpired in the Philippines during the past four years could have failed to recognize that General Aguinaldo enjoyed, above all others, the confidence of the Philippine insurgents and the respect alike of the Spanish and foreigners in the islands, all of whom vouched for his justice and high sense of honor.

Mr. Williams wrote Mr. Moore on July 18, 1898:

General Aguinaldo, Agoncillo, and Sandico are all men who would be leaders in their separate departments in any country.

I have studied as well as I could the character and career of Aguinaldo. I do not compare him with Washington. To Americans there is one character too lofty, one name too sacred, for parallel or comparison. But I believe he is to take a high rank hereafter among the men who have lived and died for liberty. He deserves to be remembered with that small band who have given life, and everything dearer than life, to their country in a losing cause.

To his loved land he gave, without a stain,
Courage and faith, vain faith, and courage vain.

He shall live with Kossuth, with Oom Paul, with Joubert, with Emmet, with Egmont and Horn, with Nathan Hale, with Warren, with all the great martyrs of history whose blood hath been the seed of the church of liberty.

He, subtle, strong, and stubborn, gave his life
To a lost cause, and knew the gift was vain.
Later shall rise a people sane and great,
Forged in strong fires, by equal war made one,
Telling old battles over without hate,
Noble, his name shall pass from sire to son.

On June 11, 1898, Consul Pratt writes to Aguinaldo from Singapore:

I wrote fully to Admiral Dewey concerning you, and to the American Government have pointed out that you and you alone were equal to the occasion.

Consul-General Wildman writes to Aguinaldo from Hongkong June 25, 1898, calling upon him to stand shoulder to shoulder with the American forces, saying:

I have vouched for your honesty and earnestness of purpose to the President of the United States and to our people, and they are ready to extend their hand to you as a brother and aid you in every laudable ambition. I give you my assurance that you can always call upon me to act as your champion should any try to slander your name.

Do not forget that the United States undertook this war for the sole purpose of relieving the Cubans from the cruelties under which they were suffering, and not for the love of conquest or the hope of gain. They are actuated by precisely the same feelings toward the Filipinos. Whatever the final disposition of the conquered territory may be, you can trust the United States that justice and honor will control all their dealings with you.

On the 14th of July, 1898, he writes to Aguinaldo:

You have certainly fulfilled nobly all the promises I made on your behalf to Admiral Dewey.

I am glad to see that our commissioners, in their report, do not indorse the thoroughly refuted slander that Aguinaldo accepted any money from the Spaniards for his own purposes. But the revolution was compromised by an agreement with the leaders of the insurrection to withdraw from the island, and the promise from the Spaniards that the people should have representation in the Cortes of Spain; that the friars should be sent away; that the right of association and a free press should be enjoyed.

These promises were all broken. "The civil guard began to whip and to shoot and abuse the people as before; and it is stated that in the province of Manila more than 200 were executed. The money that had been paid to the rebel leaders was at once converted into a fund for a new revolution." The transaction, on the whole, seems not to have been disadvantageous to the Filipinos, who, our commissioners say, had a great many soldiers, but had only about 800 small arms, consisting of rifles, shotguns, and a few cannon of antiquated models. The fund that had been obtained from the Spaniards was invested in modern arms of approved pattern. On the 1st of May, 1898, Admiral Dewey destroyed the Spanish fleet, and on the 19th of the same month Aguinaldo came, and brought thirteen of his staff with him, and was allowed to land at Cavite and organize an army.

The junior Senator from Colorado, in a manly speech with much of which I find myself in hearty accord, says that Aguinaldo is brave, honest, and patriotic. I am glad to congratulate the Senate that at least one voice has been found among the supporters of the policy of imperialism to do justice to a gallant enemy. President Schurman has borne to him a like tribute. These gentlemen, at least, have had clearness of sight enough to see that the men who try to disgrace the name of Aguinaldo are disgracing Admiral Dewey and President McKinley. Either Aguinaldo is brave, honest, and patriotic, or the great Admiral, with the approval of the great President, brought over and armed a traitor and a hireling and put him at the head of the men who were then our allies in arms.

Why, Mr. President, the men who chatter so glibly in newspapers, and, I am sorry to say, sometimes in the Senate, do not seem to reflect that they are contradicted by the conduct of the people of the Philippine Islands, by the conduct of Admiral Dewey himself.

The Philippine masses, from the beginning until this hour, have been most loyal to this chieftain.

* * * General MacArthur, one of the bravest American commanders in the Philippines, declared a few months ago: "When I first started in against these rebels I believed that Aguinaldo's troops represented only a faction. I did not like to believe that the whole population of Luzon—the native population—was opposed to us. But having come thus far, after having occupied several towns and cities in succession, and having been brought into contact with both 'insurrectos' and 'amigos,' I have been reluctantly compelled to believe that the Filipino masses are loyal to Aguinaldo and the government which he heads."

I give an extract from an address by the Filipino leaders just after Aguinaldo landed, published by Murat Halstead in his "Story of the Filippines":

In exchange for the loftiness of mind with which Señor Aguinaldo has rigidly carried out the terms of the peace agreement, General Primo de Rivera had the cynicism to state in the congress of his nation that he had promised no reform to Señor Aguinaldo and his army, but that he had only given them a piece of bread in order that they might be able to maintain themselves abroad. This was reechoed in the foreign press, and Señor Aguinaldo was accused in the Spanish press of having allowed himself to be bought with a handful of gold, selling out his country at the same time. There were published, moreover, in those Spanish periodicals, caricatures of Señor Aguinaldo which profoundly wounded his honor and his patriotism.

Señor Aguinaldo and the other revolutionists who reside in Hongkong agreed not to take out one cent of the $400,000 deposited in the chartered banks and the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, the only amount which Señor Aguinaldo received from the Spanish Government on account of the stipulated indemnity, but to use it for arms in order to carry on another revolution in the Philippines in case the Spanish Government should fail to carry out the peace agreement, at least in so far as it refers to general amnesty and reforms. All the above-named revolutionists, Señor Aguinaldo setting the example, resolved to deny themselves every kind of comfort during their stay in Hongkong, living in the most modest style, for the purpose of preventing a reduction by one single cent of the above-named sum of $400,000, which they set aside exclusively for the benefit of their country.

LAWSUIT BETWEEN DON J. ARTACHO AND DON E. AGUINALDO.

Señor Artacho, induced by the father solicitor of the Dominicans and the consul-general of Spain, filed in the courts of that colony a summons against Don E. Aguinaldo, asking for a division of the above-mentioned $400,000 between those revolutionary chiefs who resided in Hongkong. Artacho and three others, who joined the revolution in its last days and rendered little service to it, were the only ones who desired a division of this money; whereas forty-seven revolutionaries, many of whom were most distinguished chiefs, were opposed to it, supporting the resolution which Señor Aguinaldo had previously taken in regard to it. Señor Aguinaldo, in order to avoid all scandal, did everything possible to avoid appearing in court, answering the summons of Artacho, who, realizing that his conduct had made himself hated by all Filipinos, agreed in a friendly arrangement to withdraw his suit, receiving in exchange $5,000; in this way were frustrated the intrigues of the solicitor of the Dominican order and of the Spanish consul, who endeavored at any cost to destroy the $400,000 by dividing it up.

Artacho is now on trial before a judicial court on charges preferred by various revolutionists for offenses which can be proved; he has no influence in the revolutionary party. (Extract from "The Story of the Philippines," by Murat Halstead, pages 66–67.)

But what do you think of Admiral Dewey, and General Anderson, and General MacArthur? Did Dewey bring over to his aid a perjured scoundrel, who had sold his soul like Judas and his country like Arnold, form an alliance with him, ask his cooperation and advice, deliver over Spanish preservers to him, and commit our sick to his tender mercy?

The United States of America does not use traitors and scoundrels for its tools in the great transactions of its history.

The English General Buller repelled indignantly some attacks in the British press upon the character of the Boers, and said indignantly that it became a brave people to honor a brave enemy. I think the American people can do that. They will yet do justice to the martyrs of liberty in this oriental isle. What generous American, what youth who has been stirred by the story of Thermopylæ and Marathon, what patriot who remembers Warren, what man with English blood who remembers Hampden, or Sydney, or Russell, what Dutchman who remembers Egmont and Horn, what Irishman who remembers Emmet, what Hungarian who remembers Kossuth will not feel his heart throb and his eyes moisten as he thinks of the lofty heroism and the awful tragedy of José Rizal, or as he reads the death chant which he wrote in his last hours, just before he was shot by the Spanish tyrants on the 30th of December, 1896. Our English translation gives only imperfectly the effect of the noble Spanish, the tongue in which the great scholar said he should choose to speak to his God.

Farewell, adored Fatherland; our Eden lost, farewell;
Farewell, O sun's loved region, pearl of the eastern sea;
Gladly I die for thy dear sake; yea, thou knowest well
Were my sad life more radiant far than mortal tongue could tell,
Yet would I give it gladly, joyously for thee.

Pray for those who died alone, betrayed in wretchedness;
For those who suffered for thy sake torments and misery;
For broken hearts of mothers, who weep in bitterness;
For widows, tortured captives, orphans in deep distress;
And pray for thy dear self, that thou may'st finally be free.

Farewell, adored country; I leave my all with thee,
Beloved Philippines, whose soil my feet have trod,
I leave with thee my life's love deep; I go where all are free;
I go where are no tortures, where the oppressor's power shall be Destroyed, where faith kills not, where he who reigns is God.

AGUINALDO REPRESENTED WHOLE PEOPLE.

One of the great mistakes of many honest people is the belief that Aguinaldo has in some way imposed himself upon the people of Luzon and the neighboring islands against their will; that he is an unscrupulous usurper, who forced his authority on an unwilling people. This notion is corrected a hundred times by the testimony of our officials. Aguinaldo was as much the recognized leader of his people as Kossuth was the recognized leader of the Hungarians. Admiral Dewey brought him back from exile because he was the accepted choice of his people. There were 30,000 men in arms who hailed him on his arrival as their chosen leader. The constitution he promulgated was accepted by the people who were then, throughout Luzon and the Visayas, in the enjoyment of a quiet and orderly government, republican in form, save the brief and temporary dictatorship exercised only for military purposes—a dictatorship not half as absolute in theory as the dictatorship of our President over those islands has been in theory during the last twelve months. Of course, the authority of the government of Luzon and the adjacent islands did not extend over the savage tribes in the southern islands, or over the Sultan of Sulu. But at least it paid no tribute to that sultan.

General MacArthur, talking to H. Irving Hancock, Manila correspondent of the Criterion, said, what I have once quoted:

When I first started in against these rebels, I believed that Aguinaldo's troops represented only a faction. I did not like to believe that the whole population on Luzon—the native population, that is—was opposed to us and our offers of aid and good government. But after having come this far, after having occupied several towns and cities in succession, and having been brought much into contact with both insurrectos and amigos, I have been reluctantly compelled to believe that the Filipino masses are loyal and devoted to Aguinaldo and the government which he heads.

General Otis's proclamation of January 4, 1899, recognizes that the insurgents under Aguinaldo fairly represent the people. I will not recite it at length. But there is one very significant paragraph therein. It is this:

From the tenure and substance of the proclamation of the President, I am fully of the opinion that it is the intention of the United States Government, while directing the forces generally, to appoint the representative men now forming the controlling element of the Filipinos to civil positions of trust and responsibility.

Is that not a full acknowledgment, as of January 4, 1899, in the first place, that Aguinaldo and those associated with him were the controlling element of the Philippine Islands; and next, that they were fit for civil positions of trust and responsibility?

There is another admission in that proclamation, filtered and emasculated as it was. It is a part of the President's own language. "It should be the earnest and paramount aim of the Administration to win the confidence and respect and affection of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands by insuring to them in every possible way the full measure of individual rights and liberty, which is the heritage of a free people."

It is true, is it not then, that the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands are entitled to that liberty which is the heritage of a free people? If it be true, then our imperialistic friends must answer another question—whether that liberty, which is the heritage of a free people, is consistent with the domination of any other people determining for them what shall be their institutions, laws, form of government, and policies, foreign and domestic.

Mr. President, there is one mode by which the people of the Philippine Islands could establish the truth of the charges as to their degradation and incapacity for self-government which have been made by the advocates of imperialism in this debate; and that mode was by submitting tamely and without resistance to the dominion of the United States.

WE ASKED COOPERATION, TREATED THEM AS ALLIES, AND ASSURED THEM OF INDEPENDENCE.

Aguinaldo came back to Luzon. He found 30,000 men in arms for liberty waiting to receive him. He conquered. They were poorly armed at first, but they got arms from us and they purchased arms abroad. They banished Spain from the whole of Luzon and the Visayas; they captured thousands upon thousands of Spanish prisoners; other thousands were committed to them by us, until they had the whole of the civilized portion of those islands under their command, and hemmed Spain into the city of Manila by a line of intrenchments extending from water to water. But for what they did the army of Spain could have withdrawn itself from the neighborhood of our fleet, and could have held its own against our military forces very likely to this moment.

Now, Mr. President, during all this time, down to the breaking out of hostilities on the 5th of February, 1899, the forces of the people of whom Aguinaldo was the head held that entire territory as securely, as exclusively, as the American people held Massachusetts throughout the Revolutionary war after the evacuation of Boston on the 5th day of March, 1776.

They organized a civil government. It is true Aguinaldo was declared in the beginning dictator chief, as in three instances in South America Bolivar was declared dictator. That happens in all revolutions. While the conflict of arms is going on, but simultaneously with the dictatorship, Aguinaldo declared his purpose to surrender it as soon as peace and order could be restored and liberty achieved, and as fast as that happened, peaceful and orderly local government took the place of military power.

Now, Mr. President, there is no historic fact more clearly established by historic testimony than the facts—

First, That these people were aiming at independence from the beginning.

Second, That they achieved independence.

Third, That our commanders, naval and military, our Secretary of War, our Administration at home, knew all the time that they were aiming, striving, at independence.

Fourth, That we encouraged them by every form of practical assurance.

I am not speaking now of the assurance they derived from our Constitution, our Declaration of Independence, our known principles, our past history—I am speaking of what they had the right to take and understand as assurances that their independence was to be respected. Why, Aguinaldo proclaimed it a dozen times. He announced a free constitution, an independent constitution, and established it all over the islands of Luzon and the Visayas, and these documents were immediately communicated to our commanders, and were by our commanders at once reported to Washington.

During that whole time, down to the end of December, 1898, when General Miller unwittingly, contrary to General Otis's desire, made public the order of the President, not a word of opposition or of contradiction came from American lips to them. If ever silence gave consent, if ever actions spoke louder than words, if ever conduct bound a nation, aye, if ever conduct bound a man of honor, the people of the United States are bound to respect the independence these people had achieved.

But silence and knowledge of the fact on our part were not all. We formed an alliance with Aguinaldo; our General wrote to him official letters asking his cooperation. Admiral Dewey denies, with some indignation, that he said the things which Aguinaldo relies on as forming an alliance, but the military commanders do not deny it; they confess it; they reported it to the Department of War and to the President. Twice did the commanding generals representing the United States give express assurance to that effect by their own confession.

General Anderson, who commanded in the Philippines before Merritt and Otis, says in his article in the North American Review for February, 1900:

Whether Admiral Dewey, Consuls Pratt, Wildman, and Williams did or did not give Aguinaldo assurances that the Philippine government would be recognized, the Filipinos certainly thought so, probably inferring this from their acts rather than their statements.

Every American citizen who came in contact with Filipinos at the inception of the Spanish war, or at any time within a few months after hostilities began, probably told those he may have talked with on the subject that we intended to free them from Spanish oppression. And here came in a natural misconception and misunderstanding. The general expression was, "We intend to whip the Spaniards and set you free." But this to Aguinaldo and his immediate followers had a very different meaning. To them it meant that the United States would recognize any government he and his followers might set up. It must be remembered that two years before Aguinaldo had been the leader in a rebellion the object of which was to set up an independent government. The Filipino people, in a vague way, had the same anticipation, for it must be understood that Aguinaldo is to his countrymen an ideal—an Oriental Washington—destined to be free from Spanish rule. Even if Dewey and the consuls had no right to pledge the Government, if they did so even without authority, it gives the insurgent leaders a certain equitable claim to consideration.

Now, what does the commander of the American forces tell you? He tells you that Aguinaldo inquired of Admiral Dewey if he authorized the promise made in his name by the captain of the Petrel and the two consuls, and that he received satisfactory assurances. He then goes on to say:

Receiving satisfactory assurances, he proceeded naively to say that the junta in Hongkong even then suspected that after whipping the Spaniards we would refuse them independence. The Admiral replied, assuring him that we were honorable and, having plenty of land, desired no colonies.

General Anderson adds:

Aguinaldo is mistaken in attributing this remark to the Admiral. I must plead guilty to this Delphic utterance at a subsequent interview.

General Anderson adds (North American Review, page 277):

"A few days thereafter he made an official call on me and * * * asked if we, the North Americans, as he called us, intended to hold the Philippines as dependencies. I said I could not answer that, but that in one hundred years we had established no colonies. He then made this remarkable statement: 'I have studied attentively the Constitution of the United States and I find in it no authority for colonies, and I have no fear.'

"It may seem that my answer was somewhat evasive, but I was at the time trying to contract with the Filipinos for horses, carts, fuel, and forage."

General Anderson says that when he was commander in chief of our land forces Admiral Dewey thought he could not prudently fight such vessels as the Pelayo, and other formidable ships, which were then expected through the Suez Canal, in the close waters of the bay, where they would have the support of the heavy Krupp guns on land, and proposed that General Anderson should reembark the soldiers we had landed at Cavite and take them to Subig Bay. He adds:

"At that time the insurgent Filipinos had driven the Spanish soldiers within the defenses of Manila, and had them completely invested on the land side by light field works, which they held with about 14,000 men. They were poorly armed and equipped, yet, as they had defeated the Spaniards in a number of fights in the field and had taken 4,000 prisoners, it may be asserted in the vernacular of the camp that 'they had the morale on them.'"

The Manila garrison was so demoralized at that time, and so incomplete was their line of defense, that I believe it would have been possible, by coming to an understanding with Aguinaldo, to have carried their advance works by storm and to have captured all of the city, except the walled city or the old Spanish town. Under existing orders, we could not have struck a bargain with the Filipinos, as our Government did not recognize the authority of Aguinaldo as constituting a de facto government; and if Manila had been taken with his cooperation, it would have been his capture as much as ours. We could not have held so large a city with so small a force, and it would therefore have been practically under Filipino control.

On the 1st of July, 1898, I called on Aguinaldo with Admiral Dewey. He asked me at once whether "the United States of the North" either had recognized or would recognize his government. I am not quite sure as to the form of the question, whether it was "had" or "would." In either form it was embarrassing. My orders were, in substance, to effect a landing, establish a base, not to go beyond the zone of naval cooperation, to consult Admiral Dewey, and to wait for Merritt. Aguinaldo had proclaimed his government only a few days before (June 28), and Admiral Dewey had no instructions as to that assumption. The facts as to the situation at that time I believe to be these: Consul Williams states in one of his letters to the State Department that several thousand Tagals were in open insurrection before our declaration of war with Spain. I do no know as to the number, yet I believe the statement has foundation in fact. Whether Admiral Dewey and Consuls Pratt, Wildman, and Williams did or did not give Aguinaldo assurances that a Filipino government would be recognized, the Filipinos certainly thought so, probably inferring this from their acts rather than from their statements. If an incipient rebellion was already in progress, what could be inferred from the fact that Aguinaldo and thirteen other banished Tagals were brought down on a naval vessel and landed in Cavite? Admiral Dewey gave them arms and ammunition, as I did subsequently at his request. They were permitted to gather up a lot of arms which the Spaniards had thrown into the bay, and, with the 4,000 rifles taken from the Spanish prisoners, and 2,000 purchased in Hongkong, they proceeded to organize three brigades and also to arm a small steamer they had captured. I was the first to tell Admiral Dewey that there was any disposition on the part of the American people to hold the Philippines, if they were captured. The current of opinion was setting that way when the first expeditionary force left San Francisco, but this the Admiral had no reason to surmise. But to return to our interview with Aguinaldo.

I told him I was acting only in a military capacity; that I had no authority to recognize his government; that we had came to whip the Spaniards, and that if we were successful, the indirect effect would be to free them from Spanish tyranny. I added that, as we were fighting a common enemy, I hoped we could get along amicably together. He did not seem pleased with this answer. The fact is, he hoped and expected to take Manila with Admiral Dewey's assistance, and he was bitterly disappointed when our soldiers landed at Cavite. In a few hours after our interview, two of my staff officers, Major Cloman and Lieutenant Clark, who were walking through the streets of the town, were arrested and taken before Aguinaldo. They were told by him that strangers could only visit the town by his permission, but that in their case he was pleased to give them permission to proceed.

We at once landed our forces, and on the 4th of July Aguinaldo was invited to witness a parade and review in honor of our national holiday. He did not come, because he was invited not as President but as General Aguinaldo. This led me to write him a letter, stating that, while we hoped to have amicable relations with him, I would have to take Cavite as a base of operations, and closing with this sentence:

"I have, therefore, the honor to ask your excellency to instruct your officials not to interfere with my officers in the performance of their duties, and not to assume that officers or men can not visit Cavite without your permission."

A few days thereafter he made an official call, coming with cabinet and staff and a band of music. On that occasion he handed me an elaborate schedule for an autonomous government which he had received from some Filipinos in Manila, with a statement that they had reason to believe that Spain would grant them such a form of government. With this was an open letter addressed to the Filipino people from Pedro Alexandre Peterno, advising them to put their trust in Spain rather than America.

The day before two German officers had called on Aguinaldo, and I believe they had brought him these papers. I asked him if the scheme was agreeable to him. He did not answer, but ask if we, the North Americans, as he called us, intended to hold the Philippines as dependencies. I said I could not answer that, but that he could trust the honor of the United States; in one hundred and twenty years we had established no colonies. He then made this remarkable statement:

"I have studied attentively the Constitution of the United States, and I find in it no authority for colonies, and I have no fear."

It may seem strange that my answer was somewhat evasive, but I was at the time trying to contract with the Filipinos for horses, carts, fuel, and forage. * * *

About the middle of July the insurgent leaders in Cavite invited a number of our army and navy officers to a banquet. There was some postprandial speechmaking, the substance of the Filipino talk being that they wished to be annexed, but not conquered. One of our officers, in reply, assured them that we had come not to make them slaves, but to make them freemen. A singular scene followed. All the Filipinos rose to their feet, and Buencamino, taking his wineglass in his hand, said: "We wish to be baptized in that sentiment." Then he and the rest poured the wine from their glasses over their heads.

The origin of our controversies and conflicts with the Filipinos can, as already explained, be traced back to our refusal to recognize the political authority of Aguinaldo. Our first serious break with them arose from our refusal to let them cooperate with us. * * *

The Filipinos had made every preparation to assail the Spanish lines in their front. Certainly they would not have given up part of their line to us unless they thought they were to fight with us. They therefore received General Merritt's interdict with anger and indignation. They considered the war as their war, and Manila as their capital, and Luzon as their country. * * *

The situation was exceedingly critical. Our soldiers believed that the Filipinos were almost beside themselves with rage and disappointment. The friendly relations we had with Generals Recati and Morial alone prevented a conflict then and there. * * *

I received an order from General Merritt to remove the Filipinos from the city. Had we attempted to use force, we would have had to fight to carry out our orders. In that event we would certainly have had a serious complication. With 10,000 men we would have had to guard 13,300 Spanish prisoners and fight 14,000 Filipinos. I therefore took the responsibility of telegraphing Aguinaldo requesting him to withdraw his troops, and intimating that serious consequences would follow if he did not do so. I received his answer saying that a commission would come to me the next morning with full powers. Accordingly the next day Señores Buencamino, Lagarde, Araneto, and Sandeco came to division headquarters in Manila and stated that they were authorized to order the withdrawal of their troops if we would promise to reinstate them in their present positions on our making peace with Spain. Thereupon I took them over to General Merritt.

Upon their repeating their demands, he told them he could not give such a pledge, but that they could rely on the honor of the American people. The General then read to them the proclamation he intended to issue to the Filipino people. The commission then went back to Aguinaldo for further instructions. A member of the commission brought me a letter from Aguinaldo complaining that he had been harshly treated, and that his army had given up a part of their lines to us on the understanding that there was to be a cooperation between us in the future in military movements. General Merritt directed me to reply that if Aguinaldo had been apparently harshly treated it was from a military necessity, and that, while we might recognize the justice of their insurrection, it was thought judicious to have only one army in Manila at one time.

WAS LUZON A CONQUERED COUNTRY?

We held Manila and Cavite. The rest of the island was held not by the Spaniards, but by the Filipinos. On the other islands the Spaniards were confined to two or three fortified towns. At the time referred to we could not claim to hold by purchase, for we had not then received Spain's quitclaim deed to the archipelago.

Now, mark, this is the commander in chief of the American forces, and he tells you that although Dewey did not make that promise, he did. Here were these people in arms. They were in arms for independence. They had established government all over Luzon and the Visayas; all over the civilized and Christian portions of the Philippine Islands; their army was 30,000 strong, and constantly increasing. They were a people of two or three millions, at least. They were hemming in Spain into a single city; they had a constitution, a civil constitution, a republic, and we knew it; and then Aguinaldo says to the American commander, "Our friends in Hongkong are getting uneasy lest you intend not to leave us independent." And the reply is, "You can trust the honor of the United States; we have had no colonies for a hundred and twenty years." And the leader of that free people answers, "I have no fear; I have read your Constitution, and there is no provision for holding colonies in it."

Why, Mr. President, the Republican party in great States of this Union have been excited to indignation within a few weeks because General Miles had told the people of Porto Rico they should have the immunities of American citizens. "Immunities" is rather a vague and uncertain word, but if the assurance of General Miles given to a people who had done nothing for themselves, of immunities, sets the constituents of my friends from Vermont, and my friends from Indiana, my friends from Iowa, into a fever of alarm lest the faith of the United States be broken, what are we to say to a statement, when we were asked if we intended to interfere with their independence, "You can trust the honor of the United States; we have had no colonies for a hundred and twenty years?"

Now, we must of course accept Admiral Dewey's disclaimer. But Dewey and Anderson called on Aguinaldo together, and Aguinaldo afterwards called on Anderson by himself. It is of little consequence which said it, or if it be of any consequence which said it, the assurance of the commander of our troops on land was more important under the circumstances than the same thing would have been coming from the Admiral. "Admiral Dewey did not say it, but I did," says the General. "I wanted to buy articles of the Filipinos." Yes, and he wanted a good deal more than that.

The Spaniards were hemmed in and kept in by the Filipinos. If Aguinaldo had withdrawn his forces, or if he had made terms with Spain, a very different and a very difficult task would have been that of the commandant of the American forces.

If there ever were a pledge of honor accepted and acted upon, and a consideration given, binding a great and noble people by the strongest tie that can bind a great and noble people—its national honor—that pledge was given that day.

But this is not all. I shall allude in a moment to the conduct of our commanders, establishing an alliance with the forces of the Philippine republic, commanded by Aguinaldo all through that year. Our attitude was maintained down to the end of December, 1898, when General Otis made this statement in a proclamation addressed to the people of the Philippine Islands, suppressing President McKinley's proclamation:

General Otis says:

It is also my belief that it is the intention of the United States Government to draw from the Filipino people so much of the military force of the islands as is possible and consistent with a free and well-constituted government of the country. * * * I am also convinced that it is the intention of the United States Government to seek the establishment of a most liberal government for the islands, in which the people themselves shall have as full representation as the maintenance of law and order will permit, and which shall be susceptible of development, on lines of increased representation and the bestowal of increased powers, into a government as free and independent as is enjoyed by the most favored provinces in the world.

That is what you told those men through your military commander six weeks before the hostilities broke out.

There is the promise. In another statement he says:

I will assure the people of the Philippine Islands the full measure of individual rights and liberties, which is the heritage of a free people.

Now, what does that mean? What does that mean, Mr. President? My honorable friend says we must hold on to those islands forever; that he is a dastard who does not think so. And yet General Otis, whom the honorable Senator as I have no doubt justly eulogized, as the representative of the honor and the justice of the people of the United States, uttered that promise. Did he utter that promise to a people of slaves, half Spaniards and half savages in character? Did he utter that promise to a people incapable of self-government? He sent home his dispatch, and he has been in command there ever since till just now.

The President says he did not authorize that proclamation but he approved it.

Here, then, Mr. President, is the constant proclamation from the beginning that independence is the object of the Philippine people, known all along to the commanders and the Government of the United States.

Here is an independence actually achieved.

Here is a free, orderly, constitutional government, under which two or three million people are living, with schools, churches, universities, a congress, an administration, and an army.

Here is the oppressor driven out of every foot of his own land except one city, and penned up in that.

Here are two distinct, separate assurances from our military commanders that it is not the purpose of the United States to meddle or interfere with that people.

Here is the accepting and acting upon that assurance in one instance, the first time it was given, early in July, 1898.

Here is the benefit obtained by the United States:

The Spanish army kept within our grasp and within the fire of our guns, instead of escaping to the interior.

But that is not all. We recognized that independence in many ways. We made an alliance with Aguinaldo and his people; the facts were reported to our Administration at home, and the alliance never disclaimed.

Now, be it remembered that during all this time President McKinley disclaimed any title to any part of the Philippine Islands except Manila. He declared more than once, in language which is familiar, that we, the United States, have claimed no title to any part of the islands except the town.

We got no title, pretense of title, or claim of title to an inch of the territory beyond the city of Manila and its defenses, until the ratification of the treaty on the 10th day of May, 1899.

Now, if we had no title, who had? Will any man stand up in this Senate, in the American Senate, in the closing year of the nineteenth century, and declare that a rightful title to that territory was still in Spain? The man who would declare that, had better go to Spain to live. He has drawn in no Americanism with his mother's milk.

The whole correspondence in that period is a correspondence between allies. It discloses that they are fighting for independence on their side and we disclose no purpose to interfere with it on ours. On the 4th of July, 1898, General Anderson writes to Aguinaldo:

I have the honor to inform you that the United States of America, whose land forces I have the honor to command in this vicinity, being at war with the Kingdom of Spain have entire sympathy and most friendly sentiments for the native people of the Philippine Islands.

For these reason I desire to have the most amicable relations with you and to have you and your people cooperate with us in military operations against the Spanish forces.

In doing this I do not wish to interfere with your residence here and the exercise by yourself and other native citizens of all functions and privileges not inconsistent with military rule.

That was, it seems to me, a communication by the commanding general of the purpose of the United States not to interfere with the civil functions of the Philippine government, except so far as was necessary for the conduct of military operations at Cavite.

On the 6th of July, 1898, General Anderson addresses Aguinaldo by his title of commanding general, and says:

I should like to have your excellency's advice and cooperation, as you are best acquainted with the resources of this country. It must be apparent to you that we do not intend to remain here inactive but to move promptly against our common enemy. I am solicitous to avoid any conflict of authority which might result from having two sets of military officers exercising command at the same place. I am also anxious to avoid sickness, by taking sanitary precautions. Your sanitary medical officers have been making voluntary inspections with mine, and fear epidemic disease if the vicinity is not made clean. Would it not be well to have prisoners work to this end under the advice of the surgeon?

I again renew my assurance of distinguished consideration.

July 6, 1898 (page 5), General Anderson replies to Aguinaldo (again addressing him "Señor Don Emilio Aguinaldo, Commanding Philippine Forces"), and says:

I am encouraged by the friendly sentiments expressed by your excellency * * * to endeavor to come to a definite understanding, which I hope will be advantageous to both.

Very soon we expect a very large addition to our forces, and it must be apparent to you as a military officer that we will require much more room to camp our soldiers, and also storeroom for our supplies. For this I would like to have your excellency's advice and cooperation, as you are best acquainted with the resources of the country.

He also says that the medical officers of the two commands have been making voluntary inspections together, and asks whether it would not be well to have the prisoners work to make the vicinity clean, under the advice of the surgeons.

July 9, 1898, General Anderson reports (page 6) to the Adjutant-General of the United States Army, Washington, D. C.:

General Aguinaldo tells me he has about 15,000 fighting men, but only 11,000 armed with guns, which mostly were taken from the Spaniards. He claims to have in all 4,000 prisoners. When we first landed he seemed very suspicious and not at all friendly, but I have now come to a better understanding with him, and he is much more friendly and seems willing to cooperate. But he has declared himself dictator and president and is trying to take Manila without our assistance. This is not probable, but if he can effect his purpose he will, I apprehend, antagonize any attempt on our part to establish a provisional government.

July 14, 1898, General Anderson requests Aguinaldo that he give his (Anderson's) officers all possible assistance in making reconnoissance to the lines and approaches, and that Aguinaldo favor them with his advice (page 6). He adds: "Officers coming from me will have a note to that effect."

July 18, 1898 (page 8), General Anderson reports to the Adjutant-General, U. S. Army:

Since reading the President's instructions to General Merritt, I think I should state to you that the establishment of a provisional government on our part will probably bring us in conflict with the insurgents, now in active hostility to Spain.

July 19, 1898 (page 8), General Anderson writes to Aguinaldo, saying that Maj. J. F. Bell, U. S. A., has been sent by Gen. Wesley Merritt, U. S. A., to collect for him by the time of his personal arrival certain information concerning the strength and positions of the enemy and concerning the topography of the country surrounding Manila. He adds:

I would be obliged if you would permit him to see your maps and place at his disposal any information you have upon the above subjects, and also give him a letter or pass addressed to your subordinates which will authorize them to furnish him any information they can on these subjects and to facilitate his passage along the lines upon a reconnoissance around Manila.

July 19, 1898 (page 9), General Anderson writes to Aguinaldo:

Your offer of assistance is appreciated and your assurances of good will are most gratifying.

July 22, 1898 (page 9), General Anderson writes to Aguinaldo:

I observe that your excellency has announced yourself as a dictater and proclaimed martial law. As I am here simply in a military capacity I have no authority to recognize this assumption. I have no orders from my Government on the subject; and, so far as I can ascertain, your independent status has not been recognized by any foreign power. Happy as I am to see you fighting so bravely and successfully against a common enemy, I can not, without orders, recognize your civil authority.

General Anderson writes to Aguinaldo on the 23d of July, 1898:

Señor Don EMILIO AGUINALDO,
Commanding Phillippine Forces.

GENERAL: When I came here three weeks ago, I requested your excellency to give what assistance you could to procure means of transportation for the American Army, as it was to fight in the cause of your people. So far I have received no response. As you represent your people, I now have the honor to make requisition on you for 500 horses, 50 oxen and ox carts. If you can not secure these, I will have to pass you and make requisition directly on the people.

Now put that letter, dated the 23d of July, 1898, addressed to Señor Don Emilio Aguinaldo, commanding Philippine forces (and there are plenty similar communications), with Admiral Dewey's own to our Government that the people want independence. Who would doubt that a people unskilled in diplomatic forms, or would doubt that a people most skilled in diplomatic forms, would rightfully understand that the United States knew that Aguinaldo was the representative of his people, and, second, that they were then fighting for their independence?

July 24, 1898 (page 10), Aguinaldo replies to General Anderson:

I came from Hongkong to prevent my countrymen from making common cause with the Spanish against the North Americans, pledging before my word to Admiral Dewey to not give place (to allow) to any internal discord, because (being) a judge of their desires, I had the strong convictions that I would succeed in both objects, establishing a government according to their desires.

Thus it is that in the beginning I proclaimed the dictatorship, and afterwards, when some of the provinces had been liberated themselves from Spanish domination, I established a revolutionary government that to-day exists, giving it a democratic and popular character as far as the abnormal circumstances of war permitted. * * *

It is true that my government has not been acknowledged by any of the foreign powers, but we expected that the great North American nation, which struggled first for its independence, and afterwards for the abolition of slavery, and is now actually struggling for the independence of Cuba, would look upon it with greater benevolence than any other nation.

He then expresses his indebtedness for our generosity and cautions General Anderson against disembarking our troops in places conquered by the Filipinos from the Spanish, without previous notice to his government, because as yet no formal agreement exists between the two nations, and the Philippine people might consider the occupation of its territories by North American troops as a violation of its rights.

On October 27, 1898, General Otis writes to Aguinaldo in regard to the establishment of a convalescent camp. He says:

General EMILIO AGUINALDO,
Commanding Revolutionary Forces, Malolos, Philippine Islands.

GENERAL: * * * I know that you would not offer objections if it could be so placed as not to give your people annoyance, since it could not be in any wise a menace, but, on the contrary, would place our sick within your power and to a certain extent under your protection. * * * I am fully convinced of your wish to maintain harmonious relations with the United States forces and government of Manila.

Aguinaldo writes a little later:

I can answer for my people, because they have given me evident proofs of their absolute confidence in my government, but I can not answer for that which another nation whose friendship is not well guaranteed might inspire in it [the people]; and it is certain that I do this not as a menace, but as a further proof of the true and sincere friendship which I have always professed for the North American people, in the complete security that it will find itself completely identified with our cause of liberty.

July 21, 1898 (page 12), General Anderson reports to the Adjutant-General of the United States Army:

Since I wrote last Aguinaldo has put in operation an elaborate system of military government, under his assumed authority as dictator, and has prohibited any supplies being given us except by his order. As to this last, I have written to him that our requisitions on the country for horses, ox carts, fuel, and bamboo (to make scaling ladders) must be filled, and that he must aid in having them filled. His assumption of civil authority I have ignored, and let him know verbally that

I could and would not recognize it, while I did not recognize him as a military leader.

I suppose the word "not" is a misprint.

He adds:

It may seem strange that I have made no formal protest against his proclamation as dictator, his declaration of martial law, and publication and execution of a despotic form of government. I wrote such a protest, but did not publish it, at Admiral Dewey's request, and also for fear of wounding the susceptibilities of Major-General Merritt, but I have let it be known in every other way that we do not recognize the dictatorship.

These people only respect force and firmness. I submit, with all deference, that we have heretofore underrated the natives. They are not ignorant, savage tribes, but have a civilization of their own; and, although insignificant in appearance, are fierce fighters, and for a tropical people they are industrious.

August 5, 1898, General Anderson reports to the adjutant-general, Department of the Pacific, etc.:

I have the honor to inform you that General Aguinaldo, through a staff officer, complains that the Signal Corps, United States Army, in putting up wires has interrupted his communications; that he was promised that this interruption would not last more than one day, but that it has now been out of working order for three days; that he is very glad to have the army use his telegraph poles, but it is so important to keep his communication that he earnestly requests prompt action in the matter.

August 10, 1898 (page 14), General Merritt issues instructions to General Babcock to ask insurgent generals or Aguinaldo for permission to occupy their trenches, but if refused not to use force.

July 30, 1898 (page 15), General Anderson reports to the adjutant-general, Department of the Pacific, etc., referring to instructions in relation to an issue of rations to Spanish prisoners:

I made verbal answer that if their prisoners were kept here they would have to be well fed, but that he could, of course, remove them if he saw fit to do so.

August 1, 1898 (page 15), Aguinaldo writes to Consul Williams:

I am fully persuaded that the Filipinos will arrive at the height of happiness and glory if in future they can show with raised heads the rights which to-day are shown by the free citizens of North America. These islands will be in effect one of the richest and pleasantest countries of the globe if the capital and industry of North Americans come to develop the soil.

Answering Consul Williams's suggestion that this might be accomplished without annexation to the United States, he says (pages 16, 17):

But I do not believe these unworthy suspicions. I have full confidence in the generosity and philanthropy which shine in characters of gold in the history of the privileged people of the United States, and for that reason, invoking the friendship which you profess for me and the love which you have for my people, I pray you earnestly, as also the distinguished generals who represent your country in these islands, that you entreat the Government at Washington to recognize the revolutionary government of the Filipinos, and I, for my part, will labor with all my power with my people that the United States shall not repent their sentiments of humanity in coming to the aid of an oppressed people.

Say to the Government at Washington that the Filipino people abominate savagery; that in the midst of their past misfortunes they have learned to love liberty, order, justice, and civil life, and that they are not able to lay aside their own wishes when their future lot and history are under discussion. Say also that I and my leaders know what we owe to our unfortunate country; that we know how to admire and are ready to imitate the disinterestedness, the abnegation, and the patriotism of the grand men of America, among whom stands pre-eminent the immortal General Washington.

You and I both love the Filipinos; both see their progress, their prosperity, and their greatness. For this we should avoid any conflict which would be fatal to the interests of both people, who should always be brothers. In this you will acquire a name in the history of humanity and an ineradicable affection in the hearts of the Filipino people. (From General Aguinaldo to Mr. Williams, United States consul.)

On pages 19 and 20 are memoranda of notes to General Anderson, which it is said were drawn up and submitted to General Anderson by the commissioners of Aguinaldo. It contains this article:

10. We are pleased, lastly, to be certain (affirm) that our own commissions and petitions do not signify acknowledgment on our part of North American sovereignty in these islands any more (or longer) than the necessity of actual war (demands).

General Merritt replies, August 20, 1898 (page 20):

As most of them (memoranda) seem to be reasonable, it gives him much pleasure to say that he agrees to the following.

And then he assents to several of them in terms. He does not express any objection to the others.

In reply to a further communication of Aguinaldo, dated August 21 (page 21, etc.), General Merritt directs Major Bell to make certain communications, the third of which is as follows (page 22):

(3) That I have every disposition to represent liberally the Government at Washington, which I know is inclined to deal fairly with him and his people; but not knowing what the policy of that Government will be, I am not prepared to make any promises, except that in the event of the United States withdrawing from these islands care will be taken to leave him in as good condition as he was found by the forces of the Government.

Major Bell, in a note of explanation (page 23), says:

Their lack of definiteness and my unwillingness to comment upon the language seemed to arouse their suspicions and apprehensions.

August 27, 1898 (page 25), Aguinaldo addresses General Merritt and reminds him:—

* * That without the long siege sustained by my force you might have obtained possession of the ruins of the city, but never the rendition of the Spanish forces, who could have retired to the interior towns.

September 8, 1898 (page 28), General Otis, in command and the military governor in the Philippines, addresses Aguinaldo a letter in which he claims no authority except over Manila. Then urging him to a certain course of conduct, says (page 29):

By the able representatives who have charge of the interests of the Philippine revolutionary forces this conclusion will be admitted to be incontrovertible, and argument on the point is unnecessary. Can they who seek civil and religious liberty, and invite the approval and assistance of the civilized world, afford to enter upon a course of action which the law of nations must condemn?

Also:

It is well known that they have made personal sacrifices, endured great hardships, and have rendered aid. But is it forgotten that my Government has swept the Spanish navy from the seas of both hemispheres, sent back to Spain the Spanish army and navy forces recently embarked for your destruction and for the secure holding of its Philippine possessions; that since May 1 last its Navy has held the city of Manila at its mercy, but out of considerations of humanity refused to bombard it, preferring to send troops to demand surrender and thereby preserve the lives and property of its inhabitants? Is it forgotten that the destruction of the Spanish navy and the retention of Spanish armed men in its European possessions has opened up to you the ports of the island of Luzon and held Spain helpless to meet its refractory subjects?

It was undertaken by the United States for humanity's sake, and not for their aggrandizement or for any national profit they expected to receive, and they have expended millions of treasure and hundreds of the lives of their citizens in the interest of Spanish suffering colonists.

In a communication October 14, 1898 (page 36), General Otis writes to Aguinaldo, speaks of the necessity of establishing a convalescent camp, and says:

Should the emergency become imminent, the dictates of humanity and the overwhelming demands of my Government would oblige me to establish a convalescent camp in this locality, to which troops could be sent for recuperation, and to relieve the congested situation which must attend the presence of so large a body of armed men within a thickly populated city. I have in mind for this possible camp the grounds on the shore of the bay formerly occupied by United States troops and designated Camp Dewey, or the high ground to the east of the city. It is my desire to place it at a locality which would not inconvenience any organizations connected with your forces or the surrounding inhabitants, and to the emergency of this anticipated proceeding I respectfully invite your consideration and ask your assistance should execution become necessary. Should action of this character be decided upon, I beg of you to rest firmly in my unqualified assurances that it will be undertaken in a spirit of the greatest friendliness and with the sincere desire to neither compromise nor affect in the slightest degree your interests and those of the people whom you represent, but, on the contrary, to enhance them.

Permit me to subscribe myself, General, with the highest respect,

Your most obedient servant,

E. S. OTIS,
Major-General, U. S. V.,
United States Military Governor in the Philippines.

October 27, 1898 (page 39), General Otis writes to Aguinaldo conceding that he is right in his interpretation of General Merritt's requirements fixing the lines for the occupation of the two forces. This is exceedingly important as showing that the place where the hostilities broke out was within the Filipino territory and not in ours. He further expresses the opinion that all difficulties have arisen from a misunderstanding, and assures Aguinaldo of his confidence in the sincerity of his desire to maintain harmonious relations.

November 2, 1898 (page 41), General Otis, addressing Aguinaldo by his title of Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, commanding Philippine revolutionary forces, calls attention to—the erroneous impressions which publicly prevail regarding the humane sentiments and good intentions cherished by the Filipinos, and which are so damaging to them in securing a position as a people which they seek to invoke. You will please pardon me for this allusion, but the matter is so important to the best interests of the Filipinos, that I have taken the liberty, uninvited, to present it.

Confident that you seek the welfare of your people, may I in that confidence ask you to use your conceded influence to correct this condition of affairs and to act with me in efforts to place these prisoners in a position which will put an end to the acrimonious criticisms which now so widely prevail?

This means—if it mean anything—the advice of our commanding general to the commander of the Philippine forces so to act as to promote the desire of his people for independence.

November 3, 1898 (page 42), Aguinaldo replies, stating the reasons for treating the Spanish priests as prisoners, being for special reasons applicable to them alone, and claiming also that ordinary international law will have to give way before the just cause of a country of millions of souls, because this cause is one of humanity.

To this General Otis replies, November 10, 1898 (page 44):

I am unable to comprehend the force of your remark to the effect that international law must give way before the just cause of a country of millions of souls because it is one of humanity. I fail to understand how the principles of that law can be antagonistic in any particular to the welfare of a people, founded, as they are, on the best interpretation of the law of nature which the acknowledged wisdom of ages of human progress has been able to bestow. Every independent nation claiming advanced enlightenment professes to be bound by these obligations of that law and certainly would be held responsible by the civilized world should it openly violate them.

I do not think that the views you advance would receive favorable general acceptance, and believe therefore, in all sincerity, that the good name, reputation, and welfare of that people would be greatly enhanced by relieving those men from the captivity which they have so long endured.

I can only ask in conclusion that the wishes of my Government may receive more favorable consideration than your most friendly letter indicates.

Aguinaldo replies November 18, 1898 (pages 46 et seq.), discussing the question of international law with General Otis, and says:

The principles of international law sustained by the most noted authors were taken into account by me when I treated as prisoners of war civil employees and the priests. Jiore, Martens, Bluntschli, and others hold that all persons, though not forming a part of the army, but who follow it to perform their pacific functions, can be held as prisoners of war. I only exempt the hospital personnel, according to the Geneva convention, provided that they take no active part in the war.

In virtue of the right of retort, during the war of North American independence, the great Washington, to avenge the shooting of an American colonel, a prisoner in the hands of the English, deemed beyond the rules of war the English Colonel Argyll, a prisoner held by the Americans. Thanks to the intervention of the Queen of France, the order was not executed. In virtue of the same right, the German generals in the war of 1870 ordered the houses in which their soldiers had been treacherously attacked to be fired and destroyed.

He adds a statement of the aspiration of the Filipino people who aspire to a life of liberty and independence. To say the least, this most able argument, said to have been prepared by Aguinaldo's attorney-general, is worthy of any jurist anywhere, and at least compares well in ability with those of any commander who has taken our side in the discussion.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] puts this question to Commander Bradford:

I would like to ask just one question in that line. Suppose the United States, in the progress of that war, found the leader of the present Philippine rebellion an exile from his country in Hongkong, and sent for him and brought him to the islands in an American ship, and then furnished him 4,000 or 5,000 stands of arms, and allowed him to purchase as many more stands of arms in Hongkong, and accepted his aid in conquering Luzon, what kind of a nation, in the eyes of the world, we would appear to be to surrender Aguinaldo and his insurgents to Spain?

Commander Bradford answers:

We become responsible for everything he has done. He is our ally and we are bound to protect him.

The question was worthy of a manly heart, and no manly heart, as it seems to me, could answer it but one way: "We would as soon think of restoring a redeemed soul to Satan as to think of restoring the Filipinos to Spain." Then I should have expected from what I knew of that honorable Senator, another question, which perhaps may before these proceedings are over be put to him:

Suppose the United States in the progress of that war found the leader and president of the Filipino rebellion an exile from his country in Hongkong, and sent for him and brought him to the islands in an American ship, and then furnished him with 4,000 or 5,000 stands of arms, and allowed him to purchase as many more, and accepted his aid in conquering Manila, what kind of a nation, in the eyes of the world, should we appear to be to turn upon him and plunder him of the independence we had helped him to gain? What sort of a nation would we appear, in the eyes of the world to be, when we had accepted that aid, and he had conquered the entire country but one city, we knowing at the time that he and his people were striving for independence; what kind of a country should we appear to be to wrest from him that independence, to put his people under our feet, to declare that we never would let them go, whether they were fit for self-government or not, that we were there to get all we could, and to hold all we could get, and that if we had our way they should never have independence to the end of time? I wish my honorable friend from Maine had put that question also. For myself I make to it the same answer: I would as soon restore a redeemed soul to Satan as to plunder that people of the liberty for which they have fought.

Now, Mr. President, if instead of a great international transaction, this had been a case of a contract between two citizens, to be enforced in any court; if one had rendered valuable aid, or delivered valuable property, which had been accepted by the other with the declaration that a certain compensation was expected; if Aguinaldo had worked on a farm, or had helped draw a load, under such circumstances, is there a court in the civilized world—on the face of the earth—that would not have declared that silence and the failure clearly and distinctly to reject the condition, and to reject assistance, was of itself equal to an affirmative acceptance? Does not the silence of a great nation give consent as well as the silence of common men? "The people expect independence," said Admiral Dewey to the Secretary of the Navy and to the President, and no instruction was given to undeceive them.

THEY DESIRED INDEPENDENCE AND A REPUBLIC.

We knew they were fighting for independence.

June 12, 1898, Dewey sends three proclamations issued by General Aguinaldo, dated May 24, to the Secretary of the Navy.

These documents disclosed to our commanders in the East and to our Administration at home that the Philippine people were in arms for independence, and their confidence that the American people desired to aid them in the accomplishment of that holy aspiration. The receipt of such a communication was an assent, and can not be interpreted otherwise by honorable men or honorable nations.

My Beloved Fellow-Countrymen:

I accepted the treaty proposed by Don Pedro H. Paterno, agreeing with the captain-general of these islands under certain conditions, and laying down arms and dismissing the forces under my immediate control, because I believed it better for the country than to carry on the insurrection, for which resources were lacking; but since the failure to fulfill any of the said conditions certain bands were dissatisfied and remained under arms, and since a period of five months has elapsed without any step toward the reforms which we demand to advance our country to the rank of a civilized nation, like our neighbor Japan, which in a little more than twenty years has advanced to a satisfactory position, and demonstrated her power and vigor in the late war with China, while the Spanish Government remains powerless to contend with certain obstacles which constantly arrest the progress of our country with a deadly influence, which has been a principal factor in causing the uprising of the people, now that the great and powerful North American nation has come to offer disinterested protection for the effort to secure the liberation of this country, I return to assume command of all the forces for the attainment of our lofty aspirations, establishing a dictatorial government, which will set forth decrees under my sole responsibility, assisted by the advice of eminent persons, until these islands are completely conquered and able to form a constitutional convention and to elect a president and a cabinet, in whose favor I will duly resign the authority.

Given at Cavite the 24th of May, 1898.

Filipinos:

This dictatorial government proposes to begin within a few days our military operations, and being informed that the Spaniard intends to send us a parliamentary commission in order to open negotiations for restoring Spanish authority, and being resolved to admit no negotiations of that sort in view of the collapse of a former treaty by default of the same Spanish Government, and noting, moreover, the presence in this place of certain persons coming in the capacity of spies for the said Spanish Government, as general-in-chief of this region I decree as follows:

ARTICLE I. Civilians or soldiers who enter this territory with authority to negotiate, but without presenting themselves under a flag of truce as provided for such cases by international law, and also those lacking credentials and documents for their due recognition of character and personality, shall be considered guilty of serving as spies and put to death.

ARTICLE II. Any Filipino who undertakes the aforesaid service shall be considered as a traitor to his country, and there shall be imposed upon him the penalty of hanging by the neck in a public place for the period of two hours, with a label attached bearing the statement that he is a traitor to his country.

ARTICLE III. Any soldier or civilian found within our territories seeking to pass over to the enemy bearing secrets of war or plans of fortifications shall also be reckoned as a traitor and put to death.

Given in Cavite the 24th of May, 1898.

On the 10th of June, 1898, Aguinaldo addressed from Cavite to the "President of the Republic of the Great North American Nation" an eloquent but impassioned appeal. It was called out by a story in the London Times that it was the purpose of the United States to sell the Philippine Islands to Great Britain, or some other European power. Aguinaldo declares his belief that the story is a vile slander. He is then at Cavite, from which he dates his letter. He informs the President that he has organized a government there "by the consent of the Admiral of your triumphant fleet," and says his forces are then besieging Manila on the south and east, and have already captured the whole garrison of the province of Cavite, as well as that of the adjoining province of Bataan, together with the governors and officials of both provinces. He protests against the statement of the London Times, "in the name of this people, which trusts blindly in you not to abandon it to the tyranny of Spain, but to leave it free and independent, even if you make peace with Spain." He concludes thus: "I offer fervent prayers for the ever-increasing prosperity of your powerful nation, to which and to you I shall show unbounded gratitude, and shall repay you with interest that great obligation."

Now, here is an official declaration. Mark the date. It is June 10, 1898; when the insurgents had conquered the adjoining islands, with the governors and officials, and were holding Manila on the land side while the American forces alone held it by sea. Aguinaldo declares his profound affection, and that of his people, for the United States, and tells President McKinley that they are trusting him to leave them free and independent, even if we make peace with Spain. This is no question of a consul. It is not a question of a commanding general. It is not a question of an admiral. This leader of his people, in his own name and words, addresses the President of the United States and informs him of their faith—their blind faith—that the American nation will leave him and his people free and independent; will leave them exactly what the American people had declared of the Cubans when they had much less control of their own territory than the Filipinos had of theirs—that they are and of right ought to be. Our fathers of the Declaration of Independence spoke for three million; Aguinaldo spoke for eight. We declared they were what the Senate declared Cuba of right ought to be. Then the Cuban army was almost under the feet of Spain. Then every one of her capital towns, and every one of her ports, and every one of her strongholds was in Spanish hands.

Mr. E. Spencer Pratt, consul-general at Singapore, telegraphs the Department May 5, 1898, inclosing the Singapore Free Press of the day before, containing a report of the departure of Aguinaldo to join Commodore Dewey, and says that the facts are, in the main, correctly given. In that statement is the following sentence:

General Aguinaldo's policy embraces the independence of the Philippines, whose internal affairs would be controlled under European and American advisers. American protection would be desirable temporarily, on the same lines as that which might be instituted hereafter in Cuba.

Now, Mr. President, this is a pretty significant fact, fortified as it is with so many like statements coving the entire period before Aguinaldo reached Manila, perhaps before he reached Hongkong. The Government at Washington knew that he went there to put himself at the head of the Philippine forces for the purpose of achieving their independence. They knew it from an official communication, which declares that the main facts of that article are correct. And knowing it, they accepted his aid; they furnished him with arms; they dealt with him as a general; they asked for his cooperation; they permitted him to wrest from the Spaniards every spot of that territory but the city of Manila, and they never undeceived him.

What court, what public opinion, what honest man, what man of honor, what gentleman would fail to keep, letter and spirit, the promise implied by such a transaction in any circumstances in life? One of our commissioners at Paris asked Mr. Foreman, when he was testifying, if it were not true if the Spaniards failed to act up to the lofty spirit of the Psalmist—of promising to their own hurt, and changing not.

I should have liked to ask that honorable commissioner what he thought they would say of us if we accepted the assistance of these Filipinos, with the full knowledge that they were asking for their independence, and then coolly appropriated the proceeds of their devotion and valor to our own advantage.

Gen. Charles A. Whittier said before the commission, "All the success was on the native side, and yet the Spaniards surrendered between 7,000 and 8,000 men, well armed, plenty of ammunition, and in good physical condition." (Page 499, Document 62.)

General Whittier adds, "Aguinaldo's troops control all the settled part of the island (except Manila), as well as much of the southern country." * * * "Their conduct to their Spanish prisoners has been deserving of the praise of all the world. I have heard of no instance of torture, murder, or brutality since we have been in the country." (Page 500.)

"Every place had been taken from them by the Filipinos, who managed their advances and occupation of the country in an able manner." (Page 501.)

THEY HAD ACHIEVED INDEPENDENCE.

Now, there is nothing more clearly proved in the whole history of these transactions than that the desire of the Filipinos for independence, both soldiers and people, was fully known during the whole of the year 1898 and down to the time of the breaking out of hostilities—to the President, to the Secretary of State, to our consuls, to Admiral Dewey, to General Otis, and down to a time long after the capture of Manila they knew that there was an unsuspecting confidence on the part of that people that the United States had no desire to interfere with their liberty or their independence. They accepted their aid. They cooperated with them in military movements. They asked favors of them. They requested them to change their military positions for the convenience of our forces. They handed over to them prisoners of war by the thousands. They asked their advice. They gave our sick in hospitals over to their care. They made requests on them for military supplies. And not a word or a thought conveyed to them that they had any expectation but to cooperate with them against a common enemy, as an independent and as an equal ally. Whether the word ally was used—and of course no man questions the denial of Admiral Dewey—the substance of an alliance existed, and the substance of the thing was conveyed by the United States to the Philippine nation in a hundred ways.

General Otis says, speaking of the early part of August, 1898:

Outwardly peace reigned, but the insurgents, disappointed because not permitted to enjoy the spoils of war in accordance with mediæval customs, and to exercise with the United States authorities joint control of municipal affairs, were not friendly disposed, and endeavored to obtain their asserted rights and privileges through controversies and negotiations and a stubborn holding of the positions taken by their troops.—Otis Report, page 4.

A communication took place between Aguinaldo and General Merritt. A letter was addressed to Merritt, August 27, 1898, describing the line to which he would retire, and stating some conditions which he said he was compelled to insist upon. (Otis Report, page 5.)

Otis answers, August 31, that General Merritt has been unexpectedly ordered away, and that he must have a little time to acquaint himself with the conditions. (Otis Report, page 6.)

September 8, 1898, General Otis addressed Aguinaldo by the title "The Commanding General of the Philippine Forces."

He says:

I note with pleasure your allusion to your very friendly disposition toward my Government, as manifested by your prompt attendance to our request for a supply of water. * * * I do not forget that the revolutionary forces under your command have made many sacrifices in the interests of civil liberty and for the welfare of your people.

And adds that as Manila had been surrendered to the United States by Spain—by all the laws of war and of all international precedents, United States authority over Manila and its defenses is full and supreme.—Otis Report, page 7.

He goes on:

But conceding * * * that they [the forces under General Aguinaldo's command] have made great personal sacrifices, endured great hardships, and have rendered aid, my Government has swept the Spanish navy from the seas of both hemispheres, * * * and that since May 1 last its Navy has held the city of Manila at its mercy, but out of consideration of humanity refused to bombard it, * * * Is it forgotten that the destruction of the Spanish navy and the retention of Spanish armed men in its European possession has opened up to you the ports of the island of Luzon and held Spain helpless to meet its refractory subjects.—Otis Report, page 7.

He adds that the war—was undertaken by the United States for humanity's sake, and not for any aggrandizement or for any national profit it expected to receive.—Otis Report, page 7.

Otis then demands that Aguinaldo withdraw his troops beyond the line of the city's defenses before Thursday, the 15th instant, and says that if he shall decline he shall be obliged to resort to forcible action. (Otis Report, page 9.)

Aguinaldo asked him to withdraw his threat to use force, as he was fearful that he would be unable to remove his troops upon a demand. (Otis Report, page 9.)

Otis then, at Aguinaldo's request, furnishes him with a simple request to withdraw, which he might show his troops in order that they might not infer that they were withdrawing under a threat; and adds an expression of his confidence in the ability and patriotism of Aguinaldo. "The withdrawal was effected adroitly, as the insurgents marched out in excellent spirits, cheering the American troops." (Otis Report, page 10.)

Speaking of the same period, General Otis says:

The insurrection had spread to and was active in all the islands with the exception of the Zulu Archipelago. * * * Vessels flying the Spanish flag could not safely enter any ports which had been seized by the insurgents.—Otis Report, page 14.

The insurgents, whose government had taken firm root at Malolos, were, through the medium of president, cabinet, and congress, reeling off decrees and constitutional provisions at a rapid rate. Their army was continually successful against the small Spanish garrisons scattered throughout the islands, and they were beginning to acquire the belief that they were invincible. Revenue was their need and desire, and this they began to derive quite largely from imposing export duties on all products shipped to Manila.—Otis Report, page 15.

Aguinaldo's army of observation, on the outskirts of the city, contained many natives or residents of Manila.—Otis Report, page 15.

"The assertion was made and became current that certain suburbs were not within the jurisdiction of Manila." He adds: "The best opinion did not consider the suburbs, still occupied by the insurgent troops, beyond the city limits." But he afterward admits that he was mistaken and that the Filipinos were right in their claim. (Otis Report, page 15.)

October 14, 1898, General Otis addresses a long communication to "Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, commanding Philippine revolutionary forces, Malolos, P. I."

He says:

It was found impossible to determine definitely, on any existing map, either the limits of the city or the lines of its defenses.—Otis Report, pages 16–17.

He then asks Aguinaldo's assistance, if it shall become necessary, to establish a temporary convalescent camp on high ground to the east of the city, and adds:

Should action of this character become necessary, I beg of you to rest firmly in my unqualified assurances that it will be undertaken in a spirit of the greatest friendliness, and with the sincere desire to neither compromise nor affect in the slightest degree your interests and those of the people whom you represent, but, on the contrary, to enhance them.—Otis Report, page 18.

On October 20 it was reported that "insurgent troops were moving southward by railway from Malolos and other points and were being concentrated near the north line of the city," and speaks of it as a threatening demonstration. (Otis Report, page 19.)

October 22 Aguinaldo writes to General Otis, calling his attention to the fact that "the town of Pandacan has always been considered outside of the old municipal limits of Manila." (Otis Report, page 19.)

Afterwards, on October 27, Otis writes to Aguinaldo: "I have referred to General Merritt's letter of August 20, which you mention, and find that it is as you state." * * * "Pandacan is certainly far within the line of defense, and * * * have been led to believe that it has of late been considered one of the city's suburbs." (Otis Report, page 21.)

Otis then asks Aguinaldo's consent to the establishment of a convalescent camp for the American soldiers. (Otis Report, page 21.)

Aguinaldo replies, November 4, that such a camp must have American troops there to protect it, "unless it depends for security solely and exclusively upon the guaranty offered by the laws dictated by our government," and adds: "It is my duty to submit these conditions to the representatives of the people." (Otis Report, page 21.)

This was followed by dispatches from Dewey from July 17, forwarding a proclamation and decree addressed to the people and providing for the election by the people of public officers, the organization of courts, the taking of a census, a tribunal of justice and civil records, and one of revenues and property. The decree begins by this declaration:

To the People of the Philippines:

Acts of Providence have placed me in a position for which I can not but recognize my natural inefficiency, but as I have no right to violate the laws of Providence, nor to decline the duties which honor and patriotism impose upon me, I greet you, my beloved people, from that position.

In the face of the whole world I have proclaimed that the aspiration of my whole life, the final object of all my wishes and efforts, is your independence, because I have the inner conviction that it is also your constant longing, since independence for us means the redemption from slavery and tyranny, the recovery of lost liberty, and the admission to the concert of civilized nations.

I understand, moreover, that the first duty of any government is to interpret faithfully the aspirations of the people. With this in view, although the abnormal circumstances of the war have compelled me to constitute this dictatorial government which assumes full civil and military power, my constant desire is to surround myself with the most prominent people from each province, who by their conduct deserve its confidence, so that, learning from them the true needs of each, I may be enabled to adopt the most efficacious means for filling such needs and curing deficiencies in accordance with the wishes of all.

The proclamation of June 23 recites the history of the connection with Spain, and of the conflict which has resulted in a separation. He says:

And now they no longer limit their claims to the assimilation with the political constitution of Spain, but ask for definite separation from her; they are fighting for their independence, firmly convinced that the time has come when they can and must govern themselves.

So they have constituted a revolutionary government, based upon wise and just laws, adapted to the abnormal conditions through which they are passing, and at the same time preparing them to become a republic. Taking reason as the only guide for their actions, justice as the only end, and honorable work as the only means, they call upon their Philippine sons, without distinction of class, to unite firmly together for the purpose of forming a society of nobility, not nobility of birth or pompous titles, but of work and personal merit of each one—a free society where there shall be no egotism and personal politics that crush and annihilate, no envy and favoritism that debase, no bragging and charlatanry that make ridiculous.

And it could not be otherwise; a people which has given proofs of valor and long suffering in time of trouble and danger, and of industry and diligence in time of peace, is not intended for slavery; such a people is called to be great, to be one of the strongest arms of Providence to direct the destinies of humanity; such a people has sufficient resources and energy to free itself from the ruin and annihilation into which the Spanish Government has plunged it, and to claim a modest, but humble seat in the concert of free nations.

The third proclamation (also of June 23, 1898) contains careful and wise provisions for a provisional government.

Mr. President, these are three of the greatest state papers in all history. If they were found in our own history of our own Revolutionary time, we should be proud to have them stand by the side of those great state papers which Chatham declared were equal to the masterpieces of antiquity. Admiral Dewey was well justified in saying that these people were far superior in their intelligence and more capable of self-government than the natives of Cuba, and that he was familiar with both races.

On July 22 Dewey telegraphs to the Secretary of the Navy: "The people expect independence."

On the 7th of August General Merritt and Admiral Dewey sent a joint notice to the Spanish general in chief that hostile operations would begin in forty-eight hours from the receipt of the notice, to which the governor-general replies:

Finding myself constantly surrounded by insurrectionary forces, I am without places of refuge for the increased numbers of wounded, sick, women and children who are now lodged within the walls.

General Merritt and Admiral Dewey replied:

We submit, without prejudice to the high sentiments of honor and duty which your excellency entertains, that surrounded on every side as you are by a constantly increasing force, with a powerful fleet in your front, and deprived of all prospect of reenforcement and assistance, a most useless sacrifice of life would result in the event of an attack.

Now, Mr. President, look for a moment at that correspondence. They held up to the Spanish commander as the compelling reason on which he must surrender that he is surrounded by the constantly increasing forces of Aguinaldo. They speak separately in another sentence of the powerful fleet in his front. But the letter of General Merritt and Admiral Dewey puts the necessity for surrender distinctly on the ground that the Spaniards are surrounded by the powerful and increasing forces of Aguinaldo.

Mr. President, that was in July. The American forces held Manila and Iloilo Bay only in the group. Two positions only in that group of twelve hundred islands, and the rest was held peaceably, quietly, and without dispute by the people thereof. The forces of Aguinaldo had complete authority and control of Luzon. They had established a constitution, a representative government; courts, schools, and public worship had resumed their ordinary course. They had fought for independence, which they had won. No act like those acts which unhappily accompany great wars, even among civilized people, has been laid to their charge; not even acts like those which were charged upon the contending parties during our own civil war. There is an occasional statement that Aguinaldo, or his comrades, desired to loot or to plunder the city of Manila; that they desired to inflict cruel vengeance upon the Spanish, and that they desired to perform this or that act of cruelty. As to the acts of Aguinaldo, all his declarations to his people contradict these charges.

On August 1 the Secretary of the Navy cables to Admiral Dewey: "Reported here that monks and other prisoners in the hands of the insurgents at Cavite are in danger of being unjustly put to death." But no confirmation of that report comes from Dewey.

On the 9th of August the Assistant Secretary of the Navy cables to Admiral Dewey:

At the instance of the French ambassador, information concerning treatment of Spanish prisoners by insurgents is requested.

To which Admiral Dewey replies:

Referring to your telegram of August 29, from my observation and that of my officers, the Spanish prisoners are not treated cruelly by the insurgents, but they are neglected, not from design, but owing to want of proper food supply, medical outfit, and attendance.

At this time Admiral Dewey thought a force of 5,000 men all that was necessary to reduce the islands to our complete control. At present 36 war vessels, 2,051 officers, and 63,483 men are found necessary.

I shall not speak just now of the President's proclamation, suppressed by General Otis because he feared that it would bring on instant hostilities, and the unexpected publication of that proclamation by General Miller, with its effect. But I wish to allude here to the President's instructions to General Merritt of May 28, 1898, as showing the absolute folly of the claim of those persons who speak of the Filipinos as savages, as niggers, as barbarians.

The President says (page 86, Doc. No. 208):

All churches and buildings devoted to religious worship and to the arts and sciences, all schoolhouses, arc, so far as possible, to be protected, and all destruction or intentional defacement of such places, of historical monuments or archives, or of works of science or art, is prohibited.

That instruction was made to the Filipinos by General Merritt and proclaimed August 14, 1898 (page 87):

VI. All churches and places devoted to religious worship and to the arts and sciences, all educational institutions, libraries, scientific collections, museums, arc, so far as possible, to be protected; and all destruction or intentional defacement of such places or property, of historical monuments, archives, or works of science and art, is prohibited, save when required by urgent military necessity. Severe punishment will be meted out for all violations of this regulation.

The custodian of all property of the character mentioned in this section will make prompt returns thereof to these headquarters, stating character and location, and embodying such recommendations as they may think proper for the full protection of the properties under their care and custody, that proper orders may issue enjoining the cooperation of both military and civil authorities in securing such protection.

SIR: The revolution having taken possession of the various provinces of the archipelago, this government has found it necessary to adopt the form and organization best suited to the popular will. I have therefore the pleasure and honor of placing in your hand the inclosed decrees, which contain the organization referred to, begging that you will communicate to your Government that the desires of this government are to remain always in friendship with the great North American nation, to which we are under many obligations.

A decree announced to Admiral Dewey and doubtless at once communicated by him to the President contained the following (page 90):

To the People of the Philippines:

Acts of Providence have placed me in a position for which I can not but recognize my natural inefficiency, but as I have no right to violate the laws of Providence, nor to decline the duties which honor and patriotism impose upon me, I greet you, my beloved people, from that position.

In the face of the whole world I have proclaimed that the aspiration of my whole life, the final object of all my wishes and efforts, is your independence, because I have the inner conviction that it is also your constant longing, since independence for us means the redemption from slavery and tyranny, the recovery of lost liberty, and the admission to the concert of civilized nations.

I understand, moreover, the urgent necessity of establishing in each town a solid and substantial organization, a stronger bulwark of public security, and the only means for insuring the union and discipline which are indispensable for the establishment of a republic—that is, the government of the people by the people—and for settling international conflicts which may arise.

He then goes on to make a decree to establish a local self-government, prescribing as a condition that any inhabitant qualified shall be entitled to be elected, provided always that he is a friend of the Philippine independence.

In Aguinaldo's proclamation of June 23, 1898, establishing the revolutionary government, he says (page 95):

ARTICLE I. The dictatorial government will be entitled hereafter the revolutionary government, whose object is to struggle for the independence of the Philippines until all nations, including the Spanish, shall expressly recognize it, and to prepare the country so that a true republic may be established.

On the 6th of August, 1898 (page 99), Aguinaldo issued a proclamation to foreign governments, in which he says:

To Foreign Governments:

The revolutionary government of the Philippines on its establishment explained through the message dated the 23d of June last the true causes of the Philippine revolution, showing according to the evidence that this popular movement is the result of the laws which regulate the life of a people which aspire to progress and to perfection by the sole road of liberty.

The said revolution now rules in the provinces of Cavite, Batangas, Mindoro, Tayabas, Laguna, Morong, Bulacan, Bataan, Pampanga, Nueva Ecija, Tarlac, Pangasinan, Union, Infanta, and Zambales, and it holds besieged the capital of Manila.

In these provinces complete order and perfect tranquillity reign, administered by the authorities elected by the provinces in accordance with the organic decrees dated 18th and 23d of June last.

The revolution holds moreover about 9,000 prisoners of war, who are treated in accordance with the customs of war between civilized nations and humane sentiments, and at the end of the war it has more than 30,000 combatants organized in the form of a regular army.

In this situation the chiefs of the towns comprised in the above-mentioned provinces, interpreting the sentiments which animate those who have elected them, have proclaimed the independence of the Philippines, petitioning the revolutionary government that it will entreat and obtain from foreign governments recognition of its belligerency and its independence in the firm belief that the Philippine people have already arrived at that state in which they can and ought to govern themselves.

Accompanying this is an account of a meeting of representatives of the various towns, setting forth in an admirable manner the evidences of civilization and aspiration for freedom and their fitness for self-government:

The discussion took place with the prudence and at the length which so important a question demands, and after suitable deliberation the following declarations were unanimously adopted:

The Philippine revolution records, on the one hand, brilliant feats of arms, realized with singular courage by an improvised army almost without arms, and, on the other, the no less notable fact that the people after the combat have not entered upon great excesses nor pursued the enemy further, but have treated him, on the contrary, with generosity and humanity, returning at once to their ordinary and tranquil life.

Such deeds demonstrate in an undisputable manner that the Philippine people was not created, as all believed, for the sole purpose of dragging the chains of servitude, but that it has a perfect idea of order and justice, shuns a savage life, and loves a civilized life.

But what is most surprising in this people is that it goes on giving proofs that it knows how to frame laws commensurate with the progress of the age, to respect them and obey them, demonstrating that its national customs are not repugnant to this progress; that it is not ambitious for power, nor honors, nor riches, aside from the rational and just aspirations for a free and independent life and inspired by the most lofty idea of patriotism and national honor; and that in the service of this idea and for the realization of that aspiration it has not hesitated in the sacrifice of life and fortune.

Filipinos are fully convinced that if individuals have need of material, moral, and intellectual perfection in order to contribute to the welfare of their fellows, peoples require to have fullness of life; they need liberty and independence in order to contribute to the indefinite progress of mankind. It has struggled and will struggle with decision and constancy, without ever turning back or retrograding before the obstacles which may arise in its path, and with unshakable faith that it will obtain justice and fulfill the laws of Providence.

In virtue of the foregoing considerations the undersigned, giving voice to the unanimous aspirations of the people whom they represent and performing the offices received from them and the duties pertaining to the powers with which they are invested—

Proclaim solemnly, in the face of the whole world, the independence of the Philippines;

This document also contains the Philippine constitution (page 107), beginning—

We, the representatives of the Philippine people, lawfully invoked, in order to establish justice, provide for common defense, promote general welfare, and insure the benefits of freedom, inploring the aid of the Sovereign Legislator of the Universe in order to attain these purposes, have voted, decreed, and sanctioned the following—

POLITICAL CONSTITUTION.

FIRST TITLE.

THE REPUBLIC.

ARTICLE 1. The political association of all the Filipinos constitutes a nation, the estate of which is denominated Philippine Republic.

ART. 2. The Philippine Republic is free and independent.

ART. 3. Sovereignty resides exclusively in the people.

ART. 4. The government of the republic is popular, representative, alternative, and responsible, and is exercised by three distinct powers, which are denominated legislative, executive, and judicial. Two or more of these powers shall never be vested in one person or corporation; neither shall the legislature be vested in one individual alone.

THIRD TITLE.

RELIGION.

ART. 5. The state recognizes the equality of all religious worships and the separation of the church and the state.

The constitution contains the usual safeguards for freedom found in the constitutions of our American States.

The reports of Admiral Dewey and of General Otis and the officers under his command are ample to show that the people of the Philippine Islands were a brave and intelligent people, struggling for independence, for which they were fit, under competent and able leadership, actuated by a like spirit. They were striving for an independent republic—bravely, intelligently, and, but for us, successfully.

May 15, 1898, this appears clearly enough from the dispatches of Dewey, although in the beginning he undervalued the strength of the people of the Philippine Islands.

May 13, 1898, he telegraphs:

I can take Manila at any moment. To retain possession and thus control the Philippine Islands would require, in my best judgment, a well-equipped force of 5,000 men. Spanish force is estimated at 10,000 men. The rebels are reported 30,000 men.

May 24, he telegraphs:

Aguinaldo, the rebel commander in chief, was brought down by the McCulloch. Organizing forces near Cavite and may render assistance that will be valuable.

It will be seen that the rebels who accepted Aguinaldo as their leader were 30,000 strong before he came to them. How idle, then, in the face of that single fact, to suggest that he was imposing an unwilling domination upon that people.

May 27 Dewey telegraphs:

It is impossible for the people of Manila to buy provisions except rice.

Of course, this was due to the investment by the rebel forces. And he adds:

Steamer has just arrived from Amoy with 3,000 Mauser rifles and a great amount of ammunition for Aguinaldo, whose force is increasing constantly.

May 30 Dewey telegraphs:

Aguinaldo, revolutionary leader, visited the Olympia yesterday. He expects to make a general attack on May 31. Doubt ability to succeed.

June 6 Dewey telegraphs:

Insurgents have been engaged actively within the province of Cavite during the last week. They have won several small victories, taking prisoners about 1,800 men, 50 officers; Spanish troops, not native.

June 27 Dewey telegraphs:

Aguinaldo, insurgent leader, with 13 of his staff, arrived May 19, by permission, on Nanshan. Established self Cavite, outside arsenal, under the protection of our guns, and organized his army. I have had several conversations with him, generally of a personal nature. Consistently I have refrained from assisting him in any way with the force under my command, and on several occasions I have declined requests that I should do so, telling him the squadron could not act until the arrival of the United States troops. At the same time I have given him to understand that I consider insurgents as friends, being opposed to a common enemy. He has gone to attend a meeting of insurgent leaders for the purpose of forming a civil government. Aguinaldo has acted independently of the squadron, but has kept me advised of his progress, which has been wonderful. I have allowed to pass by water recruits, arms, and ammunition, and to take such Spanish arms and ammunition from the arsenal as he needed. Have advised frequently to conduct the war humanely, which he has done invariably. My relations with him are cordial, but I am not in his confidence. The United States has not been bound in any way to assist insurgents by any act or promises, and he is not, to my knowledge, committed to assist us. I believe he expects to capture Manila without my assistance, but doubt ability, they not yet having many guns. In my opinion these people are far superior in their intelligence and more capable of self-government than the natives of Cuba, and I am familiar with both races.

Leonard R. Sargent, with the permission of Admiral Dewey, spent the greater part of the months of October and November, 1898, in company with Paymaster Wilcox, in the interior and northern part of the island of Luzon. They traveled more than six hundred miles. Their report is highly commended by Admiral Dewey, who speaks of "the success of their undertaking, their thoroughness of observation, and the ability shown in their report." The gentleman's observations appear in two articles published in the Outlook, September 1st and 21st, respectively, 1899.

The original report is now before me, and bears this indorsement signed by Admiral Dewey:

Approved and respectfully forwarded for the information of the Navy Department.

Especial attention is invited to this interesting and carefully prepared report, which, in my opinion, contains the most complete and reliable information obtainable in regard to the present state of the northern part of Luzon Island.

GEORGE DEWEY,
Rear-Admiral, U. S. Navy, Commanding Asiatic Station.

The report furnished evidence of the quiet and order maintained all over the island by the Filipino authorities. There was some little hesitation at permitting the gentlemen to travel without a pass from Aguinaldo, who in his turn expected an application from the American commanders. But a personal letter was obtained from Consul-General Williams to Aguinaldo requesting that passports be provided. Aguinaldo put his refusal on the ground that there was an attempt to stir up an insurrection in the northern provinces, and that should that happen he might not be able to provide for their safety. But he assured them they were free to prosecute their journey, and that they would encounter no opposition from his forces.

Mr. Sargent says:

At that time the military forces of the United States held control only in Manila, with its environs, and in Cavite, and had no authority to proceed farther. In the meantime the native population, taking matters into their own hands, had declared their independence from all foreign jurisdiction and had set up a provisional government with Aguinaldo at its head. Although this government has never been recognized, * * * it can not be denied that, in a region occupied by many millions of inhabitants, for nearly six months it stood alone between anarchy and order. It was the opinion at Manila during this period, and possibly in the United States, that their condition was something akin to anarchy.

But he adds:

We found the conditions to be much at variance with this opinion.

They visited seven provinces, of which some were under the immediate control of the central government at Malolos, while others were remotely situated and accessible only by lengthy and arduous travel. He says:

As a tribute to the efficiency of Aguinaldo's government and to the law-abiding character of his subjects, I offer the fact that Mr. Wilcox and I pursued our journey throughout in perfect security and returned to Manila with only the most pleasing recollections of the quiet and orderly life which we found the natives to be leading under their new régime. * * * We traveled first across the province of Nueva Ecija, by far the poorest and least interesting of all the provinces we visited. And yet even here we were greatly surprised by the intelligence and refinement of the inhabitants. * * * We were particularly struck by the dignified demeanor of our hosts and by the graceful manner in which they extended to us their welcome. We had unlimited opportunities for conversation with the citizens of the towns, and we found everywhere a class that gave evidence of considerable culture and a certain amount of education. * * * The Spanish language, Spanish history, church history, and the dead languages evidently formed its leading features. The natives of this class seemed to have made use of the opportunities offered them, and they had the subjects above mentioned completely at command. * * *

Our route carried us through the valley of the Rio Grande Cagayan—probably the largest area of level country in Luzon Island. Its towns throughout give evidence of the labor that has been expended on them. Each town has an elaborate church and convent, usually built of brick. Our entertainment in the different towns varied according to the facilities at hand, but in all cases music was the leading feature. The towns of Ilagan and Aparri, with their wealthy and pleasure-loving population, provided a most elaborate entertainment. These towns are laid out in regular streets, and have many squares of substantial frame buildings. They have each a population of between ten and fifteen thousand. We spent three days at Ilagan, and I think it was here that we were brought into closest touch with the Filipino character. The cultured class which I have spoken of before was strongly in evidence, and I think before leaving we had discussed views with nearly every member of it. They all realized that they were passing through a crucial period in the history of their people, and were eager to acquire all possible knowledge that might assist them to think clearly in this crisis. On the evening following our arrival a ball was given in our honor, which was attended by all the élite of the town. There were present about fifty young women and twice that number of men. All were dressed in European fashion. The girls were pleasant, and the men comported themselves in all respects like gentlemen. It was hard to realize that we were in the very heart of a country generally supposed to be given up to semi-savages.

During our stay at Ilagan we lived at the house of the mayor. This building was of great size, and was built of magnificent hard wood from the neighboring forest. The reception room was very large, with a finely polished floor. It contained a piano and set of excellent bamboo furniture, including the most comfortable chairs and divans imaginable. The Filipinos pride themselves on their cookery, and it is indeed excellent. There is no suspicion of the greasy and garlicky flavor that characterizes a Spanish meal. The shortest of three dinners given in our honor numbered fifteen courses, and seemed interminable. In addition to fish, rice, chickens, and other domestic products of the country, there was served game of many sorts, including doves, snipes, deer, mountain buffalo, and boar. It was astonishing how many of the dishes were "comida del pais" and must be sampled by the visitor to secure a just conception of the Filipino talent in matters of the palate. The Filipino's table is always set, at least when guests are present. He is very temperate in his use of liquor. I have never seen an intoxicated Filipino.

Why, Mr. President, they seem to get along without the Maine law as well as the people of Maine get along with it.

Vigan, the capital of South Ilocos, has a population of about 28,000, and Candon, farther to the southward, is not far behind this figure. The mayor of Candon was of the hustler type, and was evidently on the outlook for an opportunity to "boom" his town. On our departure he presented us with a written description of its exceptionally desirable location from a business standpoint. Every town gave evidence of the bitter fighting that had taken place between the natives and the Spaniards. The men whom we met in the western provinces possessed in general the same characteristics that we had observed in the countrymen farther to the eastward. * * * Freedom of thought marked the views of every Filipino that I have heard express himself on the subject of religion. * * * Throughout the island a thirst for knowledge is manifested, and an extravagant respect for those who possess it. I have seen a private native citizen in a town in the interior exercise a more powerful influence than all the native officials over the minds of the inhabitants, simply because he was known to have been educated in the best schools at Manila, and was regarded for that reason as a superior man. The heroes of these people are not heroes of war, but of science and invention. Without rival, the American who is best known by reputation in Luzon is Mr. Edison, and any native with the slightest pretension to education whom you may question on the subject will take delight in reciting a list of his achievements. The ruling Filipinos, during the existence of their provisional government, appreciated the necessity of providing public schools to be accessible to the poorest inhabitants.

And then he adds:

I have found the native of the interior of Luzon an astonishingly different character from the one ordinarily met in Manila.

In the second of these articles Mr. Sargent gives an astonishing account of the awakening of the faculties of these people. He says:

We heard many tales, and were in a position to authenticate them to a great extent, of deeds that told in glowing terms of the endurance and courage the Filipinos could display when impelled by a sufficient motive. The revolution in Luzon Island was by no means a simultaneous uprising of the population, and in its early stages the force that opposed the Spanish power was not overwhelming in its numbers. In the provinces far in the interior particularly the earlier encounters found the advantage in the hands of the Spaniards, whose opponents were but small bands of the most daring and desperate natives of the vicinity, poorly armed, and entirely without organization or discipline.

Remember all along that this is indorsed by Admiral Dewey. He says:

Yet these pioneers of rebellion did win brilliant and surprising victories, and by their success encouraged their more timid neighbors to join their fortunes to the cause. * * *

At the time of our journey the patriotic enthusiasm of the population was everywhere at its height. The boast of ever inhabitant was the national army, whose organization was then being rapidly perfected. Commissions were eagerly sought by the young men of the higher class, and there were more volunteers for service in the ranks than could be armed or uniformed. It is universally asserted that every preparation should be made to defend the newly won independence of the island against all foreign aggression. The older Filipinos, especially those of wealth and influence, declared their desire to give every support in their power to the cause, and were as much a part of the warlike movement as those who actually took up arms.

This was before the negotiation of the treaty of peace, before the debate in the Senate, and before the date of the anti-imperialist leagues or political movements here.

That the civil power should be placed in the same hands was a dangerous experiment, but at the same time a necessary one. The first object of the Filipinos had been to win their independence; the next was to defend it. For both these purposes they had need of their best fighting material, and the selection was made accordingly. The result proved more fortunate than there had been reason to hope. While exercising absolute authority throughout the island and governing entirely by military law, the leaders of the army appeared, nevertheless, to endeavor to mete out justice to all classes alike.

They continued, moreover, to assert their intention to relinquish their temporary power when the establishment of a perfect peace should make such a step possible, and gave most encouraging proofs of the good faith with which they spoke.

On the whole, as far as I could judge, the tendency was upward. The young officers displayed an earnest desire to improve their minds for the benefit of the state, and seemed to be impelled by the ambition to prove themselves worthy of the trust that had been confided in them.

The report finds on several occasions Spanish prisoners—priests, soldiers, and civil officials. It says:

We have seen representatives of each of these three classes in these towns. We could detect no signs of previous ill treatment, nor of undue restriction. On the contrary, they appeared to possess the freedom of the town in which they lived.

Speaking of the smaller towns, they say:

They were well grounded on only three points—the destruction of the Spanish squadron in Manila harbor, the surrender of Manila, and the declaration of the Philippine government at Malolos of the independence of the islands, and the establishment of a republican form of government with Aguinaldo as president.

Balls were given in their honor. They were welcomed to the houses of the principal inhabitants, where they found very much such a reception, in the way of elegant hospitality, as they would have found in traveling in this country or anywhere in Europe.

Speaking of the provinces of Cagayan and Isabella, they say:

An idea of their wealth can be obtained from the fact that before the Philippine insurrection $3,000,000 in tobacco alone came yearly from the one province of Isabella. Both provinces raise also sugar, rice, cocoa, and coffee. Cattle also are shipped. * * *

At Aparri we went alongside the Philippina, and reached the wharf by crossing this vessel. We were met on board by Commandante Leyba, military commander of the province of Cagayan. We were taken to a private house where we were quartered during our stay at Aparri. Here we met Colonel Tirona, commander of the military district including the provinces of Nueva Vizcaya, Isabella, and Cagayan. He welcomed us cordially, and continued from that time to treat us in a very friendly manner. We remained at Aparri three days, until the departure of the steamer Oslo, November 9. (Par. 41.)

The steamer Saturnas, which had left the harbor the day before our arrival, brought news from Hongkong papers that the Senators from the United States at the congress of Paris favored the independence of the islands, with an American protectorate. Colonel Tirona considered the information of sufficient reliability to justify him in regarding the Philippine independence as assured and warfare in the island at an end. For this reason he proceeded to relinquish the military command he held over the provinces, and to place this power in the hands of a civil officer elected by the people. On the day following our arrival in Aparri, the ceremony occurred which solemnized this transfer of authority in the province of Cagayan. The presidentes locales of all the towns in the province were present at the ceremony, conducted by a native priest. After the priest had retired, Colonel Tirona made a short speech, stating that, since in all probability permanent peace was at hand, it became his duty to relinquish the authority he had previously held over the province, and to place it in the hands of a civil officer elected by the people. He then handed the staff of office to the man who had been elected "jefe provincial." This officer also made a speech, in which he thanked the disciplined military forces and their colonel for the service they had rendered the province, and assured them that the work they had begun would be perpetuated by the people of the province, where every man, woman, and child stood ready to take up arms to defend their newly won liberty, and to resist with the last drop of their blood the attempt of any nation whatever to bring them back to their former state of dependence. His speech was very impassioned. He then knelt, placed his hand on an open Bible, and took the oath of office. He was followed by the three other officers who constitute the provincial government, the heads of the three departments—justice, police, and infernal revenue. Every town in this province has this same organization. At the time of our departure, Colonel Tirona planned to go within a few days to Iligan, and from there to Bayombong, repeating this ceremony in the capital city of each province. (Par. 42.)

The report goes on to say:

There are no Spaniards here, with the exception of two or three merchants. One of these we have met. He is pursuing his business entirely unmolested. (Par. 43.)

The above statement about Spanish provinces is repeated in regard to some other provinces, and there is no exception to this condition of things throughout the entire island. They sum up their conclusions as follows:

53. INTELLIGENCE AND EDUCATION OF THE NATIVES.

The Philippine officers, both military and civil, that we have met in all the provinces that we have visited have, with very few exceptions, been men of intelligent appearance and conversation. The same is true of all those men who form the upper class in each town. The education of most of them is limited, but they appear to seize every opportunity to improve it. They have great respect and admiration for learning. Very many of them desire to send their children to schools in the United States or Europe. Many men of importance in different towns have told us that the first use to be made of the revenue of their government, after there is no more danger of war, will be to start good schools in every village. The poorer classes are extremely ignorant on most subjects, but a large percentage of them can read and write.

54. RELATION BETWEEN RICH AND POOR.

There is a very marked line between these two classes, and this has been broadened by the insurrection, for the reason that military officers must equip themselves without pay, and that civil officers have numerous expenses for which they receive no return. All officers, civil and military, have therefore been chosen from the richer class, and the political and military power of the provinces is in the hands of that class. The private soldiers are fed and clothed by the government and allowed a very small amount of spending money—in the western provinces 30 cents in silver per week.

55. ATTITUDE OF THE MILITARY TOWARD THE CIVIL CLASS.

In the provinces of the east that we have visited there appears to be little or no friction between the civil and military classes. Officers and privates, as far as we could observe, treat civilians with consideration. In the provinces of Ilocos Sur and Union there is a marked difference. The officers are more domineering. In traveling in these provinces we had many opportunities to observe this attitude. When accidents happened to our carriage, the officer commanding our escort called to our assistance every native within sight. When they did not answer his call promptly, we have seen him strike them with his riding whip. One man had a serious wound on his face, where an officer had struck him with his pistol butt. He came to us for redress, after having appealed in vain to the military officer in command of the town. An order from Don Emilio Aguinaldo, dated October 18, 1898, calls the attention of his officers to the evils of this practice, and orders them to correct it in themselves and to instruct all sergeants, corporals, and privates on the attitude they should maintain toward civilians.

56. DOMINION OF THE CHURCH.

In the provinces of Nueva Ecija, Nueva Vizcaya, Isabella, and Cagayan the native priests have no voice whatever in civil matters. The Catholic church itself seems to have very little hold on the people of these provinces. Many men have expressed to us their preference for the Protestant church. In Ilocos Sur and Union there are many more priests than in the other provinces mentioned. Every pueblo and barrio has its cura, and there are higher officers of the church in the larger towns. They appear to have an important influence in all civil matters.

57. POPULAR SENTIMENT REGARDING INDEPENDENCE.

Of the large number of officers, civil and military, and of leading townspeople we have met, nearly every man has expressed in our presence his sentiment on this question. It is universally the same. They all declare they will accept nothing short of independence. They desire the protection of the United States at sea, but fear any interference on land. The question of the remuneration of our Government for the expense of establishing a protectorate is never touched upon. On the subject of independence there is again a marked difference between the four provinces first visited and those of Ilocos Sur and Union. In the former there is more enthusiasm, the sentiment is more of the people; in the latter it is more of the higher class and of the army. In these provinces we have seen signs of actual discontent with the existing state of things.

58. ATTITUDE TOWARD THE UNITED STATES.

There is much variety of feeling among the Philippines with regard to the debt of gratitude they owe to the United States. In every town we found men that said that our nation had saved them from slavery, and others who claimed that without interference their independence would have been recognized before this time. On one point they are united, however, viz: That whatever our Government may have done for them, it has not gained the right to annex them. They have been prejudiced against us by the Spaniards. The charges made have been so numerous and so severe that what the natives have since learned has not sufficed to disillusion them. With regard to the record of our policy toward a subject people, they have received remarkable information on two points—that we have mercilessly slain and finally exterminated the race of Indians that were native to our soil, and that we went to war in 1861 to suppress an insurrection of negro slaves, whom we also ended by exterminating. Intelligent and well-informed men have believed these charges. They were rehearsed to us in many towns in different provinces, beginning at Malolos. The Spanish version of our Indian problem is particularly well known.

59. PREPAREDNESS FOR WAR.

The Philippine government has an organized military force in every province we have visited. They claim it extends also into Ilocos, Norte, Abra, Lepanto, Bontoc, and Benguet. With regard to its existence in Ilocos and Benguet we can speak with assurance.

It is said that 200,000 men, from all the islands, could be put into the field well armed. They were then distributing 40,000 rifles, and ammunition was plentiful. The rifles were principally Remingtons, but many were Mausers.

THEY WERE FIT FOR INDEPENDENCE.

They say Aguinaldo in the beginning established a dictatorship. So did we. The difference is he promised to abandon it when independence was achieved, accompanied it with a form of government, and the soldiers under his command were eager to give way to the civil power, even when there came what turned out to be a false rumor that independence was not to be interfered with by us.

We, on the other hand, steadfastly refused to promise anything for the future, and we refuse it now. The dictatorship for a short time of the trusted and beloved leader of a nation fighting for freedom and the dictatorship forever of a foreign country talking about Chinese trade and mountains of coal and nuggets of gold are very different things.

It seems to me that the Filipino leaders and the Filipino people have shown themselves, under difficult and trying conditions, as fit for freedom and self-government as any people south of us on the American continent from the Rio Grande to Cape Horn. I believe if we had dealt with them as it seems to me we ought to have dealt with them, they would have established their nation in constitutional liberty much more rapidly than has been done by any Spanish-speaking people. Certainly they would have compared favorably with Haiti, with San Domingo, or even with Mexico in her early days. They devised an excellent constitution. They had a congress, they had courts, they had a president, they had a cabinet. Much less than this was declared by our imperialist friends sufficient to make Cuba a nation entitled to recognition. It is true they declared a dictatorship for their transition period, just as Bolivar did in the South American countries; just as Massachusetts did with her committee of safety during the first few years of the Revolutionary war. They had newspapers, schools, literature, statesmen. They have exhibited remarkable fighting qualities, considering the enormous superiority of the mighty antagonist with whom they had to deal. Major Younghusband, an English writer of great intelligence, sympathizing himself with the British view of human rights and the relations of powerful countries to weak ones, which our friends have imbibed of late days, says that their people were stirred to their last outbreak against Spain by the effect of a powerful novel, just as our people in the old anti-slavery days were moved by Uncle Tom's Cabin. They are Christians. In their houses and churches are found books, paintings, and other works of art. One pretty high authority—I do not think that is at all true, however—says that there was less illiteracy there than in the United States. But I have no doubt that there was less illiteracy there than in many parts of the United States, and in all parts of the continent south of the United States at a very recent period. The state papers which these people have issued show a high degree of intelligence. Their communications to our generals, whether oral or written, while they show something undoubtedly of the attitude of weakness dealing with strength, are, on the whole, highly creditable to their sagacity.

We have been furnished with the reports of the commissioners appointed by the President of the United States to investigate affairs in the Philippine Islands. They made a preliminary statement which came out by accident, not by design, just on the eve of last fall's election.

These preliminary statements fail to give us any facts as to the constitution framed by Aguinaldo and his companions; as to their own declarations of purpose in their proclamation; as to whether their authority was paramount and undisputed; whether they established good government and good order; whether they had courts or legislative assemblies, or schools, or churches. It is as if somebody should write the history of the American Revolution and the establishment of our Government without a word enabling you to ascertain whether the Americans were fit for self-government or independence; or whether France, our ally, had a duty to subjugate us, as she tried afterwards to subjugate Mexico, on the ground that other nations would if she did not; or had left out altogether any statement of our national and State constitutions, and the history of government in provinces like Massachusetts and New Hampshire, where the foot of the invader never touched the soil after they were driven out, in the early part of '76.

So whenever the character of persons are spoken of they are invariably styled the best men. I suppose that is the natural fashion of speech; that any Senator in speaking of the people of any town, or State, or neighborhood, would speak of the Republicans, or Democrats, or Populists, as the best people, according as he happened to belong to the one or the other political party.

There are many points of resemblance between Americans struggling for independence and the Filipinos. The commissioners say:

This movement was in no sense an attempt to win independence, but was merely an effort to obtain relief from abuses which were rapidly growing intolerable. The reforms demanded are set forth in a proclamation by one of the insurgent leaders.

The reforms demanded, and for which they were struggling, are not unlike those set forth in our address to the King, and our address to the people of England in 1774–75. They demanded that the lands held in mortmain by the church should be returned to the townships, or to the people, just as in the early history of England, when she was Catholic, the people passed the statutes against mortmain and limited the holding of lands by ecclesiastic authority.

Second, They demanded that "Spain should concede to the Filipinos parliamentary representation, freedom of the press, toleration of all religious sects, laws common with hers, and administrative and economic autonomy, trials in the neighborhood, equality before the law."

Why, that sounds like a passage from Bancroft's History.

"He has transported men beyond the seas," says the Declaration of Independence.

"Legal equality for all persons," "All men are created free and equal," says the Declaration of Independence. And even my friend from Connecticut thinks this is true of some of them.

The commissioners go on to say:

A powerful adjunct to the revolutionary movements was the Katipunan Society. This order was patterned on the Masonic order. It was a secret society and had about 400,000 members, who were in the main residents of the Tagalog provinces and of the valley of the Pasig River. In Manila and this valley there were 80,000 members.

I have heard somewhere that there was a similar prosperous organization in the United States in the early days, and that a commander in chief named George Washington clothed himself with its insignia and, I believe, laid the corner stone of a capitol somewhere.

I do not profess to know very much about that mighty order to which so many of the greatest men in America and throughout the world have been members, in high authority and in fullest communion, including some Presidents of the United States, but it strikes me that if in the city of Manila itself, in the single city, the only spot where these hostilities begun, with one or two trifling exceptions, held by the power of the United States, there was an order of this character, with 80,000 members, devoted to independence, it is pretty good evidence that the best citizenship, after all, is on the side of the people. Do you not think it likely that the love of liberty and the love of independence burns brighter in the human soul in proportion as the man is better? That it does not blaze quite as clearly, quite as intensely, in the bosom of the ignorant and degraded savage as in the bosom where education, and religion, and honor, and refinement have their home? I suppose that every British gentleman, and every British commissioner would have gone back to England at any time during the war of our Revolution and reported that the best men were on the side of Great Britain and that Washington was a scheming adventurer, having only the rabble for his associates.

General Gage wrote to Lord Dartmouth a week after Bunker Hill:

The rebels do not see that they have exchanged liberty for tyranny. No people were ever governed more absolutely than the American provinces now are; and no reason can be given for their submission but that it is tyranny which they have erected themselves.

According to the London Times, telegraphing under date of September 16, 1898, a private interview with Aguinaldo, it says:

The majority of the Filipinos have been struggling for freedom for years, indeed, for centuries, and now I believe they have obtained it. The only form of government he could understand was absolute independence. He had not studied political economy, and knew nothing about the various forms of government. He said: "We have no need of protection, because the Filipinos are able to cope with any army." He protested his undying gratitude to the Americans. "They came," he said, "only to fight the Spaniards, and now, having finished their task, they will return to America." He was unwilling to believe that the Americans would demand a reward for their humanity, and he declined to admit any necessity for a quid pro quo. He was confident that the Philippine republic would eventually build a navy, and that in the meantime the great nations would protect and aid a young nation, instead of grabbing its territories.

The Times, for September 20, says in a dispatch from Manila:

The insurgents, urged by constant rumors of the intention of America to reestablish Spanish rule in the archipelago, continue actively recruiting their army. Hundreds from Manila are enlisting daily, and troops are drilling everywhere. Great diligence is exhibited in imitating the American formation and manual, particularly in volley firing. The intrenchments in certain positions are being strengthened and a vigilant line of pickets is kept outside the suburbs. At the same time their attitude is much more friendly than before the evacuation. Several thousand rifles have recently been landed, and four new Maxims. Nothing important is reported from the insurgent congress, which holds sessions daily at Malos."

September 24 the Times says:

The national assembly has decided to request the Americans (1) to recognize the independence of the Philippines; (2) to establish a protectorate relating only to external affairs, and to induce the powers to recognize the independence of the islands, and (3) to appoint a joint commission of Americans and Filipinos to arrange details as to how the Philippines shall reciprocate America's services

On September 26, the London Times prints the following from its special correspondent, dated at Camp Dewey, near Manila, July 31, 1898.

The occupation of a portion of the insurgent lines, which was successfully accomplished on Friday morning, July 29, without irritation to the natives, was the first real move toward assuming the military responsibility of investing the town of Manila. This occupation was so diplomatically effected that the insurgents withdrew the small force which was in position near the seashore without protest and without delay, the only point insisted upon being the demand for a written receipt for the trenches. This point was covered by a concise letter from General Greene, announcing to Aguinaldo that the United States troops had taken possession of the works. The situation had become impossible. General Greene had established a picket line from the seashore extending along the cross roads about a mile inshore north of his camp and five or six hundred yards in the rear of the insurgent rifle pits, and another between the camp and the back country. Whenever the insurgents made what they call an attack, the American pickets found themselves in a zone of very lively fire, because the Spanish Mauser bullets found lodgment exactly along that line, and most of the shells and shrapnel burst in the immediate vicinity of the pickets or the supports. It was very irritating to the men to endure the frequent fire without being able to return a shot.

During the entire time between the surrender of Manila to the outbreak of hostilities, February 1, 1899, not only did the Filipino government extend over the whole island, except the city of Manila, but the people of that city and the full strength of that city, as shown by the reports of our military and naval commanders, were on their side. But it was continually reenforcing and strengthening its armies in the field and procuring arms and military supplies. They were also doing their best to get a fleet, and they had in fact quite a number of ships, rudely enough armed, I suppose, but constituting a naval service.

They charge Aguinaldo with a desire to loot Manila. Where is the evidence of that desire? Manila was full of his adherents, as our generals declared; there was a Masonic order there of 80,000 members, devoted, almost, to independence. It must have contained substantially every grown man in the city not a Spaniard or a foreigner.

Our generals all testify, and C. S. Wilcox testified, to the humane treatment of prisoners by the Filipinos. That treatment will compare favorably with the treatment of prisoners on either side in our own civil war; it will compare favorably with the treatment of prisoners by England in the Revolutionary war or the war of 1812.

Did he loot Iloilo? Did he loot a village or a single farmhouse throughout the length and breadth of the islands?

You can find, Mr. President, in the report of the Philippine Commission no facts that are not highly creditable to this people; the conjecture what they would do, the imputation of a purpose to plunder or loot, the imputation that Aguinaldo desired to establish a despotism, comes from a hostile fancy, and has no foundation whatever in fact.

I suppose no advocate of the policy of seizing the Philippine Islands by force, of compelling them to accept such government as we choose to impose upon them, will be likely to question the trustworthiness of the evidence of Major-General Otis. Nobody questions his zeal in that cause. Nobody questions his opportunity to know the facts. Indeed, the evidence furnished by him in his report of August 31, 1899, is made up largely of official documents. When he undertakes to penetrate the motives of the men with whom he is waging war, or engaged in diplomatic controversies or discussions, he is stating not facts, but judgment, and his judgment is likely to be affected by the same influences that affect other good and able men in like circumstances, especially the judgment of good and able and patriotic men, that the authorities of their own country are engaged in discussions with the authorities of other countries, friendly or hostile.

Now, it seems to me that it is impossible for any candid man to read carefully the report of General Otis without seeing that it absolutely overthrows, first, the claim that the people of the Philippine Islands are savages; second, that Aguinaldo and those associated with him are not actuated by an honest desire for independence and liberty; do not act and think exactly as Americans would act and think under the same circumstances, and exactly as Americans have always acted and would always act and think under like circumstances; third, that they are incapable of self-government, or of establishing institutions based on justice and constitutional liberty; fourth, that they were in the least guilty of the outbreak of hostilities; and, fifth, that their action was in the least provoked, instigated, or affected by the expressions uttered on this side, of an opposition to the policy of conquest and imperialism, except so far as those expressions are found in the prior history of this country and in the declarations of its revered fathers and patriots, from George Washington and Sam Adams and Thomas Jefferson down to Abraham Lincoln and Charles Sumner to William McKinley, and down to the Senate of the United States when it passed the resolutions declaring our policy as to Cuba.

This is confirmed by General Otis's letter to Aguinaldo, dated November 2, 1898, speaking of the treatment of the Filipino people toward the Spanish Catholic clergy and nuns, he says:

I believe that a vast majority of the reports of great cruelty and barbarous treatment practiced by the Filipinos toward these individuals, which have been put in general circulation, are untrue. Indeed I have forbidden cablegrams prepared on this subject, which I had good reason to suppose could not be substantiated.

It would require more time than I have a right to take to-day to examine the evidence, and to cite the noble state papers which demonstrate the fitness of these people for independence. Admiral Dewey's estimate, never retracted, can never be conclusively shaken. General Wheeler, on his return, declared these people fit for self-government, as he expresses it, "of a certain sort." He explains that he means local and village self-government.

Mr. President, capacity for local and village self-government is capacity for the highest self-government, as the history of New England witnesses. But there is no greater and more pestilent delusion than the notion that a strong people may take away the liberty of a weak one, if we happen to think the weak one not fit for liberty.

But I will refer to a few of the many admirable state papers. Their written constitution is a masterpiece of statesmanship. They discuss questions of international law with our representatives, and show themselves fully a match for them in debate. I especially refer to the final appeal of Mabini to our commissioners, so noble and so mournful, and the poem composed by José Rizal, in his dungeon, the night before he met his death for his country.

SAN ISIDRO, April 29, 1899.

HONORABLE GENTLEMEN: The Philippine people, through its government, makes known to the commission that it has not yet lost its confidence in the friendship, justice, and magnanimity of the North American nation.

It feels itself weak before the advance of the American troops, whose valor it admires, and in view of the superiority of their organization, discipline, fighting material, and other resources, does not feel humiliated in soliciting peace, invoking the generous sentiments of the Government of the North American people, worthily represented by the commission, and the sacred interests of humanity.

But the Philippine government, fully convinced that it has not provoked war, and that it has only employed its arms in defense of the integrity of its native land, asks for a suspension of hostilities and a general armistice in all the archipelago for the short time of three months, in order to enable it to consult the opinions of the people concerning the government which would be most advantageous, and the intervention in it which should be given to the North American Government, and to appoint an extraordinary commission with full powers to act in the name of the Philippine people.

The welfare of this unfortunate country and the triumph of the governing party in the United States of America depend upon the prompt establishment of peace. We confess ourselves weak, but we still possess resources—above all the unfaltering resolution to prolong the war for an indefinite space of time if the undertaking to dominate us by force is persisted in.

In laying before the commission the preceding statements I believe that I interpret the sentiments of my president and his government and those of the Philippine people.

I salute the commission with the greatest respect.

Your most obedient servant,

[SEAL.] AP. MABINI.

Manifesto published by Ap. Mabini, on behalf of the Philippine government, at San Isidro, April 15, 1899.

(The manifesto begins by summarizing the terms of the proclamation recently issued by the American commission, and published in the Oceania of April 5, 1899. The benevolent intentions of the American Government, its proposal to establish "an enlightened system of government under which the Philippine people may enjoy the fullest autonomy and the most complete liberty consistent with the obligations and purposes" that Government has in view, its conclusion that American sovereignty is not incompatible with the rights and liberties of the Philippine people, and its threat to overwhelm by force those who do not recognize that sovereignty are recited in some detail. The fact that the commission proposes to introduce certain improvements and reforms in the political, judicial, and economic administration of the country is mentioned, and the manifesto continues as follows:)

Such is in abstract the address to the Philippine people of the American commissioners who, to inspire greater confidence, have not hesitated to have recourse to falsehood, shamelessly asserting that my government, by not having understood the good will and fraternal sentiments of their ambitious President, has provoked war, when everybody is aware that President McKinley had to decree war in order to force the American Senators of the opposition to ratify the cession of the Philippines stipulated in the treaty of Paris, thus sacrificing to his ambition the welfare of two peoples, who ought to be united by an eternal friendship.

You clearly see that the North American Government undertakes to extend its sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, basing its claim upon a title null and void. This title is the treaty of Paris, agreed to by the Spanish-American Commission the 10th of last December, and ratified, according to the commission that signs this address, by the American Government some weeks ago, and by that of Spain on the 20th of last March. This contract to cede the islands was concerted and concluded when the Spanish domination had already ceased in the Philippines, thanks to the triumph of our arms. Moreover, in this act of cession no voice whatever was allowed the representatives of the Philippine people to which belongs the sovereignty of the islands by natural right and international laws. What a spectacle it is to see at the end of the century, called the century of enlightenment and of civilization, a people jealous and proud of its own sovereignty employing all its great powers, the result of its own continued free existence, to wrest from another people, weak but worthy of a better fate, the very rights which in its own case it believes to be inherent by law natural and divine! And how discouraging the cold and indifferent attitude, in the face of such a scandalous usurpation, taken by the great powers to whom Providence confides the high mission and the great means of guarding universal peace and justice. But no matter! We shall fight till the last breath to revindicate our own sovereignty, our independence. If the North American people is great and powerful, far greater and more powerful is Providence which watches over the unfortunate and chastises and humbles the proud. We have suffered so much in our own interests that perhaps we are quick to recognize misery. Thus, if we should lay down our arms, we should leave our sons without liberty and without the means of retrieving our fortune, and moreover we should bequeath to them all the penalties and sufferings of a conflict which of necessity they would have to face if to-day we do not release them from this task. If overwhelmed by misery and weighed down by the chains of servitude, you should picture to yourselves the sad future of your posterity, will you not a thousand times prefer death? To this lamentable state of despair would all those be reduced who without reflection allow themselves to be deceived by the specious promises of the American commission.

On the other hand, these promises, when examined, amount to nothing in practice. They are such as political parties ordinarily use to secure power, and wholly disregard once their object is attained. For it is very easy to promise when no obligation or legal responsibility to perform the promise is incurred. And moreover—be assured of this—the North American Government has not wanted and does not want to recognize our independence, because this recognition will bind it to make formal agreement with us and not to fail or depart from the terms of this agreement. For this reason I have sought it from the beginning, but the representatives of the North American Government have always refused to accord to my government an official character, having recourse first to coercion and finally to instigating war. They promised to aid us in the attainment of our liberty, and you have seen how they have just provoked us to war for being unwilling to lose our liberty by recognizing their sovereignty.

Apparently it pleases them better to have no sort of agreement with us, in order that they may make of us what best suits them, as soon as they have subjected us to their rule. It would be more to their advantage to promise us the greatest improvements in all kinds of industries and means of communication in order afterwards to possess themselves of our properties and control of all industries with the help of their great capital, reducing us to the condition of partners, or porters and workmen, if not mere domestics and servants. It is a clever and ingenious scheme, to promise us the amplest autonomy and the fullest political liberty, that afterwards they may oppress us at will, under the pretext that the concessions of liberty are prejudicial to their rights of sovereignty and international obligations. We were the equals of the Spaniards before the laws of Spain, but we in no case obtained justice without recourse to vile and underhand means and without incurring an interminable series of humiliations, for wherever we betook ourselves race-hatred pursued us, and that hatred is much more violent, cruel, and pitiless among the Anglo-Saxons.

Open your eyes, my dear countrymen, while there is yet time. Fight without truce or respite, without faltering or desponding, without measuring the duration of the conflict, the forces of the enemy, or the greatness of the sacrifices. Build not on others your happiness and welfare, for selfishness and interest prevail in the relations of individuals, of cities, and of nations, above all when they are separated by the impassable chasm opened by race hatred. Even when the Constitution of the United States is declared law in the Philippine Islands and the North American Congress accords us all, absolutely all, the rights and liberties of American citizens, and a state government, recognized by the Constitution—which is the greatest good annexation can bring us—race hatred will curtail these prerogatives, especially since section 10 of article 1 of the Constitution prohibits each State from imposing taxes on imports and exports (the products of such taxes belonging to the Treasury of the United States), and from passing laws on this point without the approval of Congress. Under this section we should not be able, without the approval of the same Congress, to lay any taxes on tonnage, nor maintain in time of peace troops and war ships to command respect for the liberties and rights we had acquired. Annexation, in whatever form it may be adopted, will unite us forever to a nation whose manners and customs are different from our own, a nation which hates the colored race with a mortal hatred, and from which we could never separate ourselves except by war.

And since war is the last resource that is left to us for the salvation of our country and our own national honor, let us fight while a grain of strength is left us; let us acquit ourselves like men, even though the lot of the present generation is conflict and sacrifice. It matters not whether we die in the midst or at the end of our most painful day's work; the generations to come, praying over our tombs, will shed for us tears of love and gratitude, and not of bitter reproach.

By authority of the president of the republic and its government.

NOTES ON THE MESSAGE OF GENERAL MILLER.

Firstly. The succession of the sovereignty of the United States to that of Spain is based on three facts, viz:

The destruction of the Spanish squadron, on the surrendering at Manila of the Spanish army, and on the treaty of Paris.

Let us examine the validity of the reasons alleged.

After the destruction of the Spanish squadron in the bay of Manila the American squadron remained there as master of the sea in those parts. This fact being based on undeniable facts, the destruction of the Spanish and the victory of the North American squadron, we admit the same without any reserve whatever.

The surrendering of the Spanish army at Manila caused the Americans to establish there a government of military occupation. If this essentially military fact furnished the only and sufficient cause for the establishment of the government of occupation, then the sovereignty of the United States must needs remain restricted to the city of Manila, for the same principle must then be applied to the townships which were conquered by the army of deliverance of the Philippines; and over and above that the sovereignty thus acquired by our Army must needs be considered as being much better justified, as the Philippine army achieved what it did without any foreign help and assistance, while on the other hand the Army of the United States would never have succeeding in taking Manila without the narrow and strong girdle of iron that our armies had laid around it.

Assuming the above premises to be correct, and applying the same to the territory of Bisayas, we can not see how here the sovereignty of the United States is to be established, for here, to be sure, we have neither a sea nor a land battle where the Americans have in any way participated.

To take the matter up from that point of view betrays but a puerile conception, and we ourselves merely drew the consequences to show how easily the argument brought forth by the American Government can be refuted.

The fact however is, that the cession of the Philippine Islands by the Spanish in favor of the Americans, and accepted by the latter nation, constitutes a violation of the sacred interest of the Philippine nation and an act of bad faith on the side of the United States. For, to be sure, a long time before the breaking out of the Spanish-American difficulties the Philippines were fighting, as they are fighting now and will always fight, for their liberty and independence; and the American nation in allying itself with our army for the destruction of the Spanish dominion has contracted a moral and political responsibility of the first order; it has, indeed, contracted the plainest obligation to aid and abet the realization of the just aspirations of the Philippines. The simplest conclusion from what we have said would be to assume that, on the Spanish suggesting the cession of the Philippine Islands (for surely we must not assume that the cession has to be traced back to the initiative of the United States), the United States would at once have considered it an act of pure justice to ascertain with regard to this matter the wishes of the Philippine nation, its ally. For, having lent to the latter to a certain extent its help in the battle for liberty and independence, it could easily be conceived that the Philippines would not suffer a new reign, least of all of a nation on whose conscience the curse of the Redskins rests as a heavy load.

Secondly. The military government which is proposed for the islands is supposed to "establish security for persons and private property on the islands," etc., etc., but, to be sure, also from this point of view we could easily dispense with said government, for both natives and foreigners, if at all sincere, can not but acknowledge that here as well as everywhere where the Philippine government has been established the public order has been fully and thoroughly established.

Thirdly. As regards the fact that General Miller is in a position, as he says, to occupy at any time and any moment with his forces the fortress and city of Iloilo, we do not doubt that the intention is entertained all right; but we can not help wondering considerably that so far he has not carried out such an intention.

Headquarters at Jaro, January 3, 1899.

MACARIO ADRIATICO.

Issue of the 8th of January, 1900.

Once in a while we read or hear in the course of this discussion some counsel as to our dealing with this people, based on the character of what is called the "Asiatic mind." I suppose that notion comes directly or indirectly from Englishmen. In the beginning the rule of England in Asia was a rule of pure force. The highest type of civilization, and, as we like to think, of human intellect, met a lower type. It had the superiority in every element of strength, except justice. The weaker races met the stronger race as weakness always meets strength—with dissimulation and deceit. England, of late, has tried a better method, and is meeting with better success.

But do you not think, Mr. President, that this talk about the Asiatic mind involves some audacity of generalization? Why, there are in Asia, I suppose, nearly or quite 800,000,000 people—more than half the population of the globe. You might as well talk about the human mind, drawing your conclusions alone from the Fiji Islanders, or about the American mind, drawing your conclusions from the Patagonians. There is as much difference between the fatalists who submit to the rule of the Sultan in Turkey and the gentle and philosophic Buddhist, and the busy, ambitious, enterprising Japanese, who have taken their place among the foremost of civilized nations in half a century, or these Filipinos with whom we are dealing, their hearts full of the passion for republican liberty, as between the haughty and effeminate Spaniard and the brave, sturdy, constant, and wise Swede or Norwegian. You might as well invite us to subdue Denmark and draw an inference of her unfitness for self-government from the Spaniards as to impute to this race, whose liberty you ask us to crush out, what you call the "Asiatic mind."

The state papers of Aguinaldo, the discussion of the law of nations by his attorney-general, the masterly appeal of Mabini, are products of the Asiatic mind. They are not unworthy of the Asiatic mind, the vehicle through which came to us the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, the poetry of David, the eloquence of Isaiah, the wisdom of Solomon, the profound philosophy of Paul. A pure and unmixed Asiatic race, during the century just closing, has given to Europe its masters in finance, in art, in the drama, in music, and to England a statesman who by the force of his own unaided genius brought a proud aristocracy to his feet. It is not quite time to dismiss contemptuously eight hundred million of the human race to the class of inferior races, and almost to the class of inferior animals.

HOW HOSTILITIES CAME TO PASS.

An attempt has been made to shift the responsibility for this war to the men who resisted it. It has not been very successful.

No man whose intellectual ears are not long enough to reach from here to the Philippine Islands is likely to believe that these men were instigated to fight—not by the men who undertook to buy them like sheep and pay for them in gold; who were looking with greedy eyes on their lands, and their coal, and their mines of precious metals, and their hemp-bearing fields; who were hurrying soldiers and men-of-war to their islands after they had made peace with their old tyrant, but by the men who resisted all these things, who counseled peace, who desired that we should let them alone, unless they asked our help.

When I spoke in the Senate on the 9th of January, 1899, which was the beginning of the public debate, except a constitutional argument made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], there had been a declaration of war on both sides. General Miller lay with his soldiers in the bay of Iloilo. He had been for weeks urging General Otis to give him the order to attack, pleading that the insurgents were strengthening their forces in the city and increasing his difficulty every day. The President's proclamation claiming sovereignty and ordering Otis to enforce it had been made public. Aguinaldo had met it by a counter proclamation declaring that if there were any attack made on the Visayas, he and his people would fight. That proclamation of Aguinaldo's had been pasted over all the walls of Manila, a city full of his adherents. Allowing for the difference of time, that was more than twenty-four hours before I spoke and nearly forty-eight hours before my speech was made public.

Now, what was it that brought this thing to pass? What was it that substituted for the gratitude of that people when they pressed about our consuls and our soldiers early in the year 1898, welcoming them as deliverers, welcoming them almost as angels from heaven—a feeling first of doubt, then of suspicion, then of sullen dislike, then of fierce hatred, and finally culminating in war to the death? If you would answer this question, ask yourself what the American people would have done in a like case. Ask yourself what you would have done in a like case. Think of the lessons you have received from your fathers, and the lessons I doubt not you have handed down to your sons. This people had gone joyously about the work of building up their republic. They had established local governments all over the islands. They were eager to learn the English language—the native language of freedom. They were studying the lives of our own great patriots and liberators. They had driven the Spaniards from their soil, save for a single city, and, whether right or wrong, they were confident of their capacity to capture that. They had been furnished with arms. Aguinaldo and his companions had been brought over, and the work for which they had been brought over and armed had been done. Now they find, first, a constant and contemptuous treatment in private of their soldiers by ours, which the American, I am sorry to say, almost alone among civilized nations, extends to the people of other races. But they found also that the promises we were making them were vague and ambiguous. The old frank talk of the consuls, though never disavowed by our Administration, was never repeated except in three or four special cases where we were trying to get some advantage from them. We had used them. We had profited by them. We had squeezed the orange, and it now seemed we were not unlikely to be ready to throw away the peel. They found that the American press and American public speakers were beginning to talk less and less of liberty and more and more of trade. The words justice, freedom, righteousness seemed to be disappearing from our vocabulary. Then after the capture of Manila, when General Otis had declared that not more than 5,000 soldiers would be necessary to keep the peace in that entire archipelago of 1,200 islands, they saw we were hurrying over reenforcements and increasing our naval and military strength. Then came the tone of demand and of authority. President McKinley had said again and again and again in public speech that we had no rightful title to a foot of the territory in those islands outside of the limits of Manila. And yet our generals were demanding with unconcealed threats the contraction of their lines and the expansion of ours. Then came the President's proclamation; the substitution for it by General Otis of one reaffirming the promises of independence, and the unfortunate accident by which both these proclamations came out together.

Now, I should think that might look to the Asiatic mind as disingenuous and portraying a purpose to deception. Of course we know it was pure accident. We know the honorable character of the President and the honorable character of General Otis. But suppose there had come out after Yorktown a proclamation by the King of France claiming that he had bought sovereignty over the whole of our thirteen colonies, and directing his generals to enforce it, and then on the same day a proclamation from the French commander assuring us that we were to be free and independent as the most-favored province on earth. Would not there have been indignation? Would not there have been, even in the staid Puritan mind, a flame of fire? Would not there have been war? The only difference between that case and this is that I do not think there would have been a Frenchman found reckless enough to have attributed the event to a speech in the French Assembly counseling peace and protesting against that dishonor.

How idle to attribute this condition of things, going on for seven months, to the effect of pamphlets and speeches made 10,000 miles away, most of them made long after this condition of things became established! There is one simple key to the history of those seven months. Apply that solution and everything is accounted for; everything falls into its natural order. Suppose the Filipinos to be governed by the same motives which would have governed you or any liberty-loving American in their condition. Suppose a people thirsting for liberty, desiring self-government and independence, menaced by a superior power, ready to defend their principles to the death if need be, and yet in the light of the history of their mighty antagonists, incredulous that such a thing can be possible. Every fact that reaches us from any trustworthy source is in this way explained, and can be explained in no other way. It was the spirit of liberty stirring the people of the Philippine Islands as of old it stirred the Englishman; as of old it stirred the Swiss; as of old it stirred the Swede; as of old it stirred the Greek; and as in the earlier and better days of Spain it stirred the Spaniards themselves. And when word came to the Filipino from our country, dedicated to and founded upon liberty, of a treaty to destroy his independence, and with an offer, most insulting to all manly hearts, to give him good government from without, this Asiatic vindicated his right to stand by the side of liberty-loving nations of all mankind. If he could not be there, at least he could die.

Now, there is a marvelous resemblance between the condition of the people of the Philippine Islands during the last year and that of Spain when she was overrun by Napoleon. The Filipinos who side with Aguinaldo, are thoroughly as fit for self-government as were the people of Spain. If Admiral Dewey be right in comparing them with the people of Cuba, they were far fitter. Napoleon undertook to give them what he called a good government. The story of the Spaniards' brave resistance has been told better than any living lips can tell it by the greatest of English poets since Milton, William Wordsworth. This is his description of the feeling of the Spaniards, and this is his description of the resistance of the Spaniards:

THE FRENCH AND THE SPANISH GUERRILLAS.

Hunger, and sultry heat, and nipping blast
From bleak hilltop, and length of march by night
Through heavy swamp, or over snow-clad height—
These hardships ill-sustained, these dangers past,
The roving Spanish bands are reached at last,
Charged, and dispersed like foam; but as a flight
Of scattered quails by signs do reunite,
So these—and, heard of once again, are chased
With combination of long-practiced art
And newly kindled hope; but they are fled,
Gone are they, viewless as the buried dead:
Where now? Their sword is at the foeman's heart!
And thus from year to year his walk they thwart,
And hang like dreams around his guilty bed.

Aguinaldo, as I have said, met our proclamation of December 24 with his proclamation affirming his purpose to resist. He also reissued the decree of June 18, 1898, which I will print with my remarks:

DECREE OF THE CENTRAL GOVERNMENT OF LUZON REGARDING THE ORGANIZATION OF LOCAL BOARDS, TO BE PUT IN FORCE THROUGHOUT THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

To the Philippine Nation:

Providence has placed me in a position for the sustaining of which I can not but feel my natural deficiency, but since I can not oppose myself to the commands of Providence nor shirk the duties imposed upon me by honor and patriotism, it is from this position that I salute thee, O my beloved country.

I have proclaimed to the whole world that the aspiration of my whole life, the final object of all my strength and efforts, is none other than thy independence, for I have the firm conviction that this represents thy constant desire, as independence signifies for us the redemption from slavery and tyranny, the recovery of our lost liberty, and the entering into the ranks of the civilized nations.

I understand, also, full well that the first duty of every government is the faithful interpretation of the wishes of the people. Therefore, although the abnormal conditions produced by the war have forced me to institute this dictatorial government, which comprises the full civil and military power, my constant wish has been to surround myself with the most prominent persons from each province, who by their bearing have gained the confidence of the same, in order that, learning from them the real needs of each province, I may adopt the most efficacious means for remedying and supplying them to the extent desired by all.

I appreciate, besides that, the pressing necessity of establishing in each town a solid and lasting organization as a stronghold for public security and as the only means for insuring the union and discipline indispensable for establishing the republic; that is, the government of the people by the people, and to avoid international conflicts that might occur.

In virtue of the considerations expounded, I decree the following:

ARTICLE 1. The inhabitants of each township still held by the Spanish will agree as to the best means to combat and annihilate the same according to the resources at their disposal, giving to the prisoners of war the treatment most conformable to the sentiments of humanity and the customs observed by cultured nations.

ARTICLE 2. As soon as a township is liberated from Spanish dominion, the inhabitants prominent by their education, social standing, and honorable character, both in the township itself and the district, will convene in a general assembly, which will proceed to elect by a majority of votes the mayor of the town and a head of each district, the center of the city proper also to be considered as a district.

All inhabitants complying with the conditions mentioned above, and provided they are friends of the Philippine independence and have attained their twenty-first year, can take part in this assembly and can be elected.

ARTICLE 3. In the same assembly also three delegates will be elected by a majority of votes, one for the police, the other as justice and civil registrar, the third as tax collector and assessor.

The chief of police will assist the mayor in the organization of the armed force which each township is to maintain to the extent of its resources, and for the preservation of order, good morals, and the hygiene of the place.

The justice and civil registrar will assist the mayor in the administration of justice, and by keeping the registers of births, deaths, marriage contracts, and the census.

The tax collector and assessor will assist the mayor in the collection of the taxes, administration of the public funds, the cattle and cadastral registers, and in every other branch of administration.

ARTICLE 4. The mayor, as chairman, with the heads of the districts and with the delegates referred to, are to form the "boards" who are to enforce the fulfillment of the laws and ordinances, and who are to look out for the special interests of each township.

The head of the center districts will act as vice-chairman of the board and the justice as secretary.

The heads of the districts will act as representatives of the mayor in their respective districts.

ARTICLE 5. The mayors of every township, after having obtained the advice of their respective boards, are to assemble and elect by a majority of votes the chief of the province and three councilors for the three branches referred to above.

The chief of the province as president, the mayor of the principal town of the province as secretary, and the three councilors constitute the provincial council, which will see that the dispositions of this government are carried out in their province, and which will take charge of the general interest of the province, and propose to this Government such measures as may be conducive to the welfare of all.

ARTICLE 6. Said chiefs of the provinces will elect also by a majority of votes three representatives for each of the provinces of Manila and Cavite, two for each of the provinces classified as such in the Spanish legislation, and one each for all the other provinces and political and military commanderies in the Philippine Archipelago.

Said representatives will take charge of the general interests of the archipelago, as well as of the special interest of their respective provinces, and will constitute the revolutionary congress, which will propose to the present government all measures regarding the order in the interior and the exterior safety of the islands, and will be consulted by the government in all important questions which admit of delay or waiting.

ARTICLE 7. The persons elected for any of the offices referred to can not enter upon them unless properly confirmed by this government, which will issue the confirmation upon presentation of the documents of election.

The documents of election will serve as credentials for the respective persons.

ARTICLE 8. The military chiefs nominated by this government in each province are not to interfere with the management and administration of the same, confining themselves to ask for such assistance in troops or material as they may need from the chiefs of the provinces and the mayors of the towns, who, in case of actual necessity, are not to refuse such assistance.

If, however, a province is in part or as a whole threatened or occupied by the enemy, the military chief highest in rank is entitled to assume all the functions of a chief of the province until the danger has disappeared.

ARTICLE 9. The government will name for every province a commissioner for the special purpose of carrying out the provisions of this decree referring to the organization, and that in compliance with the instructions which the government will communicate to him. The military chiefs who liberate a township from Spanish rule are commissioners ex officio.

Said commissioners will preside over the first assembly in each town in the respective provinces.

ARTICLE 10. As soon as the organization which forms the object of the present decree is effected, all nominations for civil offices previously made are canceled, whatever may be their origin, and all dispositions which are in opposition to the present decree are abolished.

Issued at Cavite the 18th of June, 1898.

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

Another charge has been made. It would not be entitled to serious consideration but for the fact that it has been widely circulated. It is that by the delay in the Senate in ratifying the treaty of peace the rebellion in the Philippine Islands found some comfort and support. I have seen it stated a hundred times that if the Senate had promptly ratified the treaty there would have been no war. The Senate had ratified the treaty when Aguinaldo informed our generals in command that he regretted the outbreak of the 5th of February, and proposed to withdraw his troops to a greater distance; that he wanted no hostilities, and trusted there would be no more of them, and was met with the reply that as the fight had begun it must go on.

But this treaty, considering its importance, was before the Senate for a marvelously short time. It was before the Senate for a shorter time than a large majority of all the treaties in our history, important or unimportant. It was signed at Paris on the 10th of December, 1898. It was sent to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations on the 4th of January, 1899. On the 11th of January, seven days afterwards, it was reported back from the Committee on Foreign Relations without amendment. On the 25th of January there was a unanimous agreement for a vote on the 6th of February, and on that day the treaty was ratified—with a single vote to spare. From all these proceedings the injunction of secrecy was removed.

Now, Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations had 11 members, 3 of whom were on the commission that made the treaty; and it took that committee seven days to make its report, with 3 of its members thoroughly familiar with the whole subject, on which I presume it does not require much boldness to say nearly every other member had made up his mind. It was before the Senate but twenty-six days—before a Senate crowded with all the other business of a short session. If a body of 11 men specially learned and familiar with that subject required seven days for sufficient discussion and debate, was twenty-six days an unreasonable time for a body of 90 Senators without special familiarity with the great subject?

I think I know something of the state of mind of Senators on both sides of that question; certainly I know the state of mind of many Senators among those who were opposed to the treaty; and I affirm that if there were any delay, any desire or purpose of delay anywhere, which added one hour to the interval between the report of the treaty and the final vote, that purpose or desire was not in the minds of the opposition. No, Mr. President, it is as certain as anything can be certain that if there had been a single assurance on the part of our Executive of a purpose to recognize the Filipinos in the independence they had won, or, at any rate, had largely helped to win (while we captured 10,000 prisoners, they captured 9,000; while we captured a single city, they captured the rest of the territory); if, I say, there had been a single assurance that we intended to respect the independence to which they aspired, there would have been no war.

If we had dealt with them in the treaty of peace as we dealt with Cuba there would have been no war.

If we had not hurried reenforcements to Manila, both of ships and of men, strengthening the forces of our army and navy there, after Spain had yielded, there would have been no war.

If the urgent request of Aguinaldo, after the outbreak of the 5th of February, that hostilities might cease, had not been met by the declaration of Otis that "fighting must go on," there would have been no war.

If Aguinaldo's offer to withdraw his troops and make a wider belt between the two armies had been met in a like spirit, there would have been no war.

If Senators had not been talking about holding on to all they could get, about making money out of their great act of liberation, about keeping from the people of these islands their liberty and their independence, for purposes of gain and trade, there would have been no war.

And now the attempt to charge this thing upon those of us who have but proclaimed the doctrine of the Declaration of Independence, and have but repeated again the Cuban resolutions; who have but quoted the language of the President of the United States—the responsibility for these hostilities is a proceeding not matched in impudence since the day of the upstream wolf and the downstream lamb.

The trouble with our imperialistic friends is that they can not understand that conscience, patriotism, or love of liberty can exist in other men. If they would but put themselves in the place of the Filipinos; if they would but apply the golden rule to the relations between this country and this people—this people of the Eastern Hemisphere, from which the golden rule came in the beginning. If the Filipinos knew enough of what was going on in the United States to be moved, to risk life and everything that makes life dear in the hope that their liberty might be granted, from reading the speeches of political leaders, articles in the newspapers, or debates in the Senate, is it not quite likely that they may have heard also of the Declaration of Independence, of our Constitution, of the writings of Jefferson, of the speeches of Lincoln, and of recent Presidential utterances? Is it not likely that they would attribute as much weight to them as to the speeches of Mr. Schurz, the letters of Mr. Edmunds, or the pamphlets of Mr. Atkinson? Had they not a right to believe them? Had they not a right to think that the people of the United States thought that there should be no government imposed upon them but with their consent? That the people of the United States thought that annexing them by force would be criminal aggression; that the doctrine that government rested upon the consent of the governed is a universal obligation; that it is applicable to every people the round world over; that it applies not only to some men, but to all men?

They tell us this question is settled. Is it settled? If it be settled, who settled it? Not the American people. The American people have never voted to change their government from a republic, by which every man has his equal share, into an empire governing ten or twelve million people, benevolently it may be, but in an absolutely unchecked despotism, without a single constitutional restraint. The American people have never voted that the Declaration of Independence is only a revolutionary pronunciamento which the men who made it have been constantly violating. They have never admitted yet that the Supreme Court of the United States was all wrong when, within ten years, they said that the Declaration of Independence was the spirit of our Government, of which the Constitution was only the form and letter. They have never declared as yet that George Washington and Thomas Jefferson and John Quincy Adams and Daniel Webster and Abraham Lincoln and Charles Sumner and John Marshall were false prophets. Congress has not settled it. You have not, so far, had a vote that we would undertake to rule unwilling and vassal States. We were expressly told when the treaty was up—the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] has shown that seven of the nine men who spoke for the treaty expressly admitted it—that it was to settle nothing, but only to put an end to the war with Spain, and that afterwards we would determine whether we would keep in subjection the people of the Philippine Islands. Why, our excellent and honored President himself declared again and again and again, all over the country, that the question was for Congress and not for him, and that it was his duty only to restore order and to keep order until Congress should act. When we asked you last year to give the same assurances in the matter of the Philippine Islands that you had given already in the matter of Cuba, and said that if Cuba was of right and ought to be free and independent, certainly this people, with their constitution, their achieved independence, their public order, their schools, their universities, their village governments, were and of right ought to be free and independent, we were answered: "We won't give assurances to men with arms in their hands." I did not think the answer a good one then. I thought some assurance needed to be given to the American people as well as to the Filipinos and that, hard as was the lot of that struggling people, the injury of which the American people was in danger was worse than any meditated to them. Meantime we hurried over our reenforcements and fought our battles and conquered our enemy; and now you turn upon us and say that you did not mean what you said then and that the whole thing was settled a year ago.

A little more than fourteen months ago there were presented to the Senate two propositions in sharp contrast with each other. One was a proposition to deal with the Philippine Islands as we dealt with Cuba; to assure them of their liberty; to protect them against foreign ambition and to lend our aid in restoring order; to speed them with our blessing on the pathway of freedom and independence, equal among independent nations, making such treaties with them for future commerce and intercourse as our advantage and theirs would require and as their good will and gratitude might be willing to grant.

The other was to buy them like slaves; to pay for them in gold; to set up against them the dishonored and discredited title of Spain, and to conquer them to a sullen submission and to a future of perpetual hatred and fear.

The Senate took its choice. We have had twelve months' experience. We can tell already something of the cost of this thing. It has cost us more than one hundred and fifty millions in money. An increase over 1898 of the cost of Army of more than one hundred and twenty-two millions; of the Navy, of six millions; of the pension list, four millions.

But all this is the merest trifle. It has cost us the lives of 6,000 men who are dead. It has wrecked the lives of other thousands, victims of disease and of wounds. It compels us to maintain in the future a large and costly military and naval force.

You are to keep certainly, hereafter, 50,000 private soldiers, in the flower of their youth, in that tropical clime. What is to be their fate?

Mr. President, worse than the most lavish expenditure, worse than the heaviest burden of national debt, worse than the loss of precious lives, worse than the reduction of wages, worse than the overthrow of our settled fiscal policies, is the price, the terrible price, we are to pay, if there be any lesson to be learned from human experience, in the souls of the young men we are to send as soldiers to the Tropics. Have you read the horrible, the unquotable story which comes from the English official reports of the life of the common soldiers of the English army in India? I wonder if our enthusiastic gentlemen, who prate so glibly of dominion and empire—I wonder if our well-meaning clergymen, who fancy themselves preaching the gospel of Christ to these yellow congregations, have read anything or care anything for the lessons of experience?

Hardly a deparment of the Government does not add some items of cost incident to a control or a knowledge of the late Spanish possessions.

The government of these islands will be a military government, to be assisted and gradually superseded by civil officers. No sums adequate to the purpose have been asked for, nor has any money been asked to construct and equip coast and harbor defenses necessary to military occupation or for the improvement of harbors and waterways, cleansing cities and towns, construction and maintenance of military and other railroads, relief of the needy, and the many items of expense incident to the occupation of distant and unprotected possessions, peopled by poor and untaught natives, oppressed into insurrection, and at present undisciplined to control of any kind. To keep the army of occupation of sufficient strength will involve a fearful drain upon the population of the United States, equal to more than double the loss of an army in a great battle. The cost of administering justice will not be small; the actual and constant rebellion of the natives against our rule is a strong probability, and the sullen opposition of a home-rule element must be faced and met. The islands do not promise to be self-supporting to the extent of providing for such contingencies as rebellion, and so the annual cost to the people of the United States must be increased, even as an insurance against an uprising.

Assuming that the War Department has asked for a sum sufficient to assure the occupation of the islands and a proper establishment for police purposes, it will be seen there are other large and uncertain items of cost unprovided for, and the annual appropriations will in future be nearer $200,000,000 in excess of those of 1898 than $155,712,751.

An annual increased expenditure of $200,000,000 means a continuance of existing "war taxes" and the imposition of new taxes, or borrowing by the Government to meet current expenses.

The total revenue from the great and regular sources of income for the fiscal year 1898 was—

From internal revenue	$170,900,641
From customs	149,575,062
From miscellaneous sources	20,000,000
Total	340,475,703

The amounts derived from the sales of the Pacific roads, a windfall not to be repeated, brought the total income to $405,321,335. Compared with the appropriations for 1898, there would have been a deficit of $27,748,405, or, excluding the sums received from the Pacific roads, one of $92,499,629. This on a peace basis.

An average deficit of $100,000,000 will be below rather than above the actual to be expected. This means the taking each year from productive industry of a sum representing the interest (at 3 per cent) on a capital of $3,333,000,000, and, as a standing charge, is equivalent to adding that sum to the capital of the national debt, with this difference—the bonds of the national debt are redeemable after a certain number of years, but this new charge represents a perpetual debt.

The capital of the debt of the United States at the end of 1898 was $1,047,320,000. The new expenditure will be equivalent to increasing it to $4,380,000,000. The debt of France is $6,218,871,341; Great Britain, $3,203,868,395. This gives us the second largest public debt in the world. In 1898 the per capita rate of taxation for national purposes was $4.34 a year.

But let us look at the cost other than in money. We are to give up many of the ideals (I had almost said every ideal) of the Republic. We must give up our great, priceless possessions; more precious than jewels or gold, more precious than land or power. The counsels of Washington are for us no longer; the truths of the Declaration of Independence are no longer our maxims of government; the Monroe doctrine, to which one hemisphere owes its freedom, is gone. The counsels of Lincoln, to give effect to which he repeatedly declared he would welcome assassination itself, are not to be listened to hereafter, or, if listened to, it will be by other ears than ours.

Another thing we have lost by last winter's terrible blunder. We lost the right to speak with authority in favor of peace at The Hague. The world took, I hope and believe, a forward step in that great conference. But think what might have been! We have lost the right to offer our sympathy to the Boer in his wonderful and gallant struggle against terrible odds for the republic in Africa.

> "O Freedom dear, if ever man was free,
> In all the ages, earned thy favoring smile,
> This patient man has earned it. In his cause > Pleads all the world to-day"—

all the world, except the nation that is engaged in crushing out a republic in the Philippines.

We have lost our power to speak with authority in behalf of the disarmament of nations. We must prepare ourselves for a great standing army. We already hear the demand for a large standing army, and a navy equal to that of England. The American child hereafter must be born with a mortgage round his neck. The American laborer hereafter must stagger through life with a soldier on his back.

Already we hear the doctrine preached in high places that the Constitution was intended for a small people and not for a large one.

Mr. President, a republic without a constitution is like a man without a conscience. In it is the great principle of the equality of men and manhood; from it, citizenship gets its value and labor its dignity. You have lost now the character of the great liberator, and are to take for the future the character of the great enslaver. Now, what have you to show for all this? You have imported two or three cargoes of hemp from Manila and you have benevolently assimilated the Sultan of Sulu. If you refuse to admit their products as from a part of the United States, you have got hereafter to govern them not for their interest, but for your own. Where you used to talk of liberty you are henceforth to talk only of tobacco. Your diplomacy with other nations must be not for their interest, but for yours. Will you let them make their own trade arrangements with England or with China?

Your currency laws must be made hereafter, not for their interest, but for yours, as England regulates the currency of India.

Mr. President, I can not conceal my sense of the ridiculousness, the pettiness, the vulgarity, of talking about trade and money getting, and exports and imports, and what we are to gain, in what should be the sublime hour of a people's liberation. Think of the conqueror, the liberator, the hero, saying to the world, "I shall sutler be unto the camp, and profits will ensue."

It is said that it is not a sordid argument, or a sordid nation, that considers the advantage of trade and commercial intercourse, and that is true if the argument be used in its proper place. The consideration becomes a sordid, a base, and ignoble argument when we use it to determine the question whether we shall do justice.

When you are tempted to take what belongs to another, to crush out the liberties of a people, then the suggestion that you are to make money by the transaction becomes as sordid and base a suggestion as ever was whispered into a covetous and greedy ear.

When you are asked to abandon your cherished principles, your lofty ideals, your benignant influence on mankind, to turn your polar star, your morning star, into a comet, the suggestion of money getting seems to me infinitely pitiful.

Mr. President, another thing you have got to think of. You have got to meet squarely, and to look squarely in the face, the great question of church and state. We must decide, and decide pretty soon, whether the larger part of the real estate in those islands is to be held by the religious orders, or whether we must follow the example of our English ancestors, with statutes of mortmain and trust, or whether we shall exert a power not given to Congress by the Constitution, of confiscation and despoliation.

I have been somewhat impressed by the desire of some of our imperialistic friends to avoid any responsibility for themselves in this matter and to place it all on God. I suppose these gentlemen think that every successful act of tyranny is to be charged to the Deity; certainly it is a very convenient method of getting rid of resposibility.

Is God guilty, in the opinion of these gentlemen, of the partition of Poland? Did God keep the fair isles of Greece under the feet of Turkey? Did God plunder our missionaries and torture Christians in Armenia? Did God enact the fugitive slave law? It must needs be that offenses come, but woe unto that man and woe unto that nation from whom the offense cometh.

"An impious, evil man," said the Greek orator Isocrates, "might get off if he chanced to die before he paid the penalty for his crimes; but the immortality of a State leaves it no escape from the vengeance of men or of the gods."

The President says: "I will bear your banner to a triumphant peace?" What a triumphant peace would have been ours if we had dealt with the Philippines as we dealt with Cuba.

I said last year that our commissioners came back from Paris bringing with them the cast-off clothing of the pinchbeck Napoleon, and asked us, who have seen his fate, to discard for it the spotless robes in which our fathers arrayed the beautiful genius of America.

Mr. President, it is worse than that. If we take these islands to govern as despots govern their subjects, Spain will have revenged herself upon us. Spain will be the victor, and we the vanquished. She will have revenged herself upon us as the dying monster Nessus revenged himself upon Hercules when he persuaded the beautiful Dejanira to give to the conqueror the garment steeped in his own poisoned blood. The garment stuck to his flesh, the poison entered his pores, and the hero, who had borne the world on his shoulders, and to whom nothing was impossible, cried for death in his agony—

"ego sum indefessus agendo,
Sed nova pestis adest, cui nec virtute resisti
Nec telis, armisve potest."

Wherever the Republic has gone thus far, wherever her name is known, it is an example of the equality of manhood and the freedom of man. This has made her the great benefactor in the Western Hemisphere. But if you have your way, she is to appear in the East to set an example of caste. Do you think with her great problem unsolved, with ten millions of her own people, now thirty-six years after the emancipation proclamation, still waiting for the promise of their perfect freedom to be fulfilled, you are asked to subject ten millions more, of an alien race, to a government in which they have no share, and an authority in which they have no voice. The people which were seventy millions are to be eighty millions—eighty millions, and every fourth man a serf—eighty millions, every fourth man practically an inferior—at the end of the nineteenth century, twenty millions (near seven times the number with which the nation began) practically without the rights of citizenship.

I think the American people will conclude in the end that we shall get no trade advantage either in the Philippine Islands or in China by the forcible subjugation of this people. On the contrary, we injure our trade prospects when we alienate the affection of those people by an unjust attack upon their independence. But there is no space to argue this point now.

Dr. Franklin said:

To me it seems that neither the obtaining or retaining any trade, how valuable soever, is an object for which men may justly spill each other's blood. That the true and sure means of extending and securing commerce are the goodness and cheapness of commodities, and that the profits of no trade can ever be equal to the expense of compelling it and holding it by fleets and armies.

The Doctor, I suppose, was a traitor and a little American.

But we are told if we oppose the policy of our imperialistic and expanding friends we are bound to suggest some policy of our own as a substitute for theirs. We are asked what we would do in this difficult emergency. It is a question not difficult to answer. I for one am ready to answer it.

1. I would declare now that we will not take these islands to govern them against their will.

2. I would reject a cession of sovereignty which implies that sovereignty may be bought and sold and delivered without the consent of the people. Spain had no rightful sovereignty over the Philippine Islands She could not rightfully sell it to us. We could not rightfully buy it from her.

3. I would require all foreign governments to keep out of these islands.

4. I would offer to the people of the Philippines our help in maintaining order until they have a reasonable opportunity to establish a government of their own.

5. I would aid them by advice, if they desire it, to set up a free and independent government.

6. I would invite all the great powers of Europe to unite in an agreement that that independence shall not be interfered with by us, by themselves, or by any one of them with the consent of the others. As to this I am not so sure. I should like quite as well to tell them it is not to be done whether they consent or not.

7. I would declare that the United States will enforce the same doctrine as applicable to the Philippines that we declared as to Mexico and Haiti and the South American Republics. It is true that the Monroe Doctrine, a doctrine based largely on our regard for our own interests, is not applicable either in terms or in principle to a distant Asiatic territory. But undoubtedly, having driven out Spain, we are bound, and have the right, to secure to the people we have liberated an opportunity, undisturbed and in peace, to establish a new government for themselves.

8. I would then, in a not distant future, leave them to work out their own salvation, as every nation on earth, from the beginning of time, has wrought out its own salvation. Let them work out their own salvation, as our own ancestors slowly and in long centuries wrought out theirs; as Germany, as Switzerland, as France, in briefer periods, wrought out theirs; as Mexico and the South American Republics have accomplished theirs, all of them within a century, some of them within the life of a generation. To attempt to confer the gift of freedom from without, or to impose freedom from without on any people, is to disregard all the lessons of history. It is to attempt

"A gift of that which is not to be given
By all the blended powers of earth and heaven."

9. I would strike out of your legislation the oath of allegiance to us and substitute an oath of allegiance to their own country.

Mr. President, if you once get involved and entangled in this policy of dominion and empire, you have not only to get the assent of three powers—House, Senate, and President—to escape from it, but to the particular plan and scheme and method of such escape.

My friends say they are willing to trust the people and the future. And so am I. I am willing to trust the people as our fathers trusted them. I am willing to trust the people as they have, so far, trusted themselves; a people regulated, governed, constrained by the moral law, by the Constitution and by the Declaration. It is the constitutional, not the unconstitutional, will of the American people in which I trust. It is Philip sober and not Philip drunk to whom I am willing to commit the destiny of myself and my children. A people without a constitution is, as I just said, like a man without a conscience. It is the least trustworthy and the most dangerous force on the face of the earth. The utterances of these gentlemen, who, when they are reminded of moral and constitutional restraints, answer us that we are timid, and that they trust the people, are talking in the spirit of the French, not of the American revolution; they are talking in the spirit which destroys republics, and not in the spirit that builds them; they are talking in the spirit of the later days of Rome, of the later days of Athens, and not in the spirit of the early days of any republic that ever existed on this side of the ocean or on the other.

I love and trust the American people. I yield to no man in my confidence in the future of the Republic. To me the dearest blessings of life, dearer than property, dearer than home, dearer than kindred, are my pride in my country and my hope for the future of America. But the people that I trust is the people that established the Constitution and which abides by its restraints. The people that I trust is the people that made the great Declaration, and their children, who mean forever to abide by its principles. The country in whose future I have supreme and unbounded confidence is the Republic, not a despotism on the one hand, or an unchecked and unlicensed democracy on the other. It is no mere democracy. It is the indissoluble union of indestructible States. I disavow and spurn the doctrine that has been more than once uttered by the advocates of this policy of imperialism on the floor of the Senate, that the sovereignty of the American people is inferior to any other because it is restrained and confined within constitutional boundaries. If that be true, the limited monarchy of England is inferior to the despotism of Russia; if that be true, a constitutional republic is inferior to an unconstitutional usurpation; if that be true, a man restrained by the moral law, and obeying the dictates of a conscience, is inferior to the reckless, hardened, unrestrained criminal.

Two years ago we would have been big enough, and strong enough, and brave enough to utter our opinion about the Boer war. Are we enough of a world power to dare to do it to-day? This Philippine Island possession of ours is nothing but a strait-jacket.

When President Cleveland sent in his message about Venezuela, where England made a claim which has been almost wholly supported after arbitration, our friends of the Committee on Foreign Relations almost tumbled over one another in their zeal to get into the Senate Chamber to express their sympathy for Venezuela. They couldn't let a resolution go over from one morning hour to another. Where are they now? They are bound over to keep the peace; and they are bound over to hold their peace—the open door and the shut mouth.

> The watchman's clarion voice is still;
> The warder silent on the hill.

Ah, Mr. President, if this is being a world power, for my part I would rather be a world weakness. It is asked what other nations will think of us if we withdraw from a place where we have no right to be. Does not that question savor somewhat of little Americanism? I never have observed that the great nations of the world were much in the habit of putting that question. Does England ever stop to think or to ask what other nations think of her? Did Rome ever do it? Did Greece ever do it? Great nations do not brag; they are not vain; they are not thinking of the impression they make on the small ones. When we get to be the greatest nation on earth we shall stop talking about it and bragging about it.

We hear a great deal nowadays of "Little America," of "Little Americans." Little America! Why, Mr. President, as my late colleague said, if we can not say of the United States, as Webster or his predecessor said of England, that her "morning drumbeat following the sun, keeping company with the hours, circles the earth in an unbroken strain of the martial airs of England," we can at least say that before the sun sets upon Alaska he has risen upon Maine.

"Little Americans!" Little George Washington! Little Thomas Jefferson! Little Benjamin Franklin! Little Abraham Lincoln! Little Daniel Webster!

Well, I know our friends have the names of great Americans they are willing to contrast with these. I will not presume to enter into particulars. They are all around us. The bushes are full of them.

I do not think we are much of a world power when a brave and manly Senator can say, as one said in my hearing not long ago, that he sympathized with the Boers, but would not say so publicly because of our obligation to Great Britain, who had kept the Continent from meddling with us in the late war. If two years ago such a motive for silence had been imputed to that Senator, how the indignant answer would have flashed out, "Is thy servant a dog?"

Mr. President, there lies at the bottom of what is called imperialism a doctrine which, if adopted, is to revolutionize the world in favor of despotism. It directly conflicts with and contradicts the doctrine on which our own revolution was founded, and with which, so far, our example has revolutionized the world. It is the doctrine that when, in the judgment of any one nation or any combination of nations, the institutions which a people set up and maintain for themselves are disapproved they have a right to overthrow that government and to enter upon and possess it themselves. That is the doctrine upon which intelligent Englishmen put the right of England to make war upon the Boers. They say:

> You tax, you impose unreasonable restrictions upon citizenship and upon naturalization. You tax a certain class unjustly, and therefore England purposes to interfere. You do not let Englishmen partake of your franchises on fair and reasonable terms.

Why, Mr. President, when an Englishman offers himself for naturalization elsewhere he renounces his allegiance to the Queen, and if he be an honest man he is to use any newly acquired franchises in the interest of his adopted country and without a thought of the interest of Great Britain. It becomes, therefore, none of England's business on what terms other countries choose to admit him. If she have any interest in the matter it is to prevent his being naturalized at all and to keep him from throwing off his old allegiance. The doctrine so founded is, in substance, the doctrine of the Holy Alliance—a doctrine in which England herself, under the lead of Canning, repudiated after the overthrow of Napoleon.

Now, Mr. President, somebody must be the judge whether a people make a proper use of their own territory or their own property or no, and from the necessity of the case, under the rule of this moralist, the strong nation that desires the territory and property of the weak nation must of course judge of its own rights and duties in the premises. I think that when England and Russia and Germany and the United States get fairly embarked in the crusade for the application of that principle you will find it complicated by another one, which I have heard of already in relation to the Philippine Islands. If we do not take possession some other strong power will think they are not making good use of their own territory and property, and they will take possession. You will, I think, always find that David will conclude that Naboth is not cultivating his vineyard to the best advantage. You will always find that anybody who wants the widow's ewe lamb will conclude that the widow's notions of raising it or of cooking it are not the best.

Our imperialistic friends seem to have forgotten the use of the vocabulary of liberty. They talk about giving good government. "We shall give them such a government as we think they are fitted for." "We shall give them a better government than they had before." Why, Mr. President, that one phrase conveys to a free man and a free people the most stinging of insults. In that little phrase, as in a seed, is contained the germ of all despotism and of all tyranny. Government is not a gift. Free government is not to be given by all the blended powers of earth and heaven. It is a birthright. It belongs, as our fathers said and as their children said, as Jefferson said and as President McKinley said, to human nature itself. There can be no good government but self-government.

Spain, when she was overrun by Napoleon, was at a far lower point than the people of the Philippine Islands have ever reached. They are much more fit for self-government to-day than she ever was. And yet the great English poet—greatest since Milton—speaks of the offer of Napoleon to give them good government as the last affront, more stinging and insulting than any blow ever struck by his armies, intolerable beyond devastation or death.

> We can endure that he should waste our lands,
> Despoil our temples, and by sword and flame
> Return us to the dust from which we came,
> Such food a tyrant's appetite demands;
> And we can brook the thought that by his hands
> Spain may be overpowered, and he possess,
> For his delight, a solemn wilderness
> Where all the brave lie dead. But when of bands
> Which he will break for us he dares to speak,
> Of benefits, and of a future day,
> When our enlightened minds shall bless his sway,
> Then the strained heart of fortitude proves weak,
> Our groans, our blushes, our pale cheeks declare
> That he has power to inflict what we lack strength to bear.

Already the old language of freedom, independence, self-control, self-government is passing away. You hear in many high quarters expressions of gratitude to England; that it is by her favor that we have been able to accomplish our policies without interference from foreign powers. I have the most friendly and kindly feelings for the people of Great Britian. It is a noble stock. It is made up of noble strands. The sturdy Saxon, the hardy, adventurous Scotsman, the brave and generous Irishman make up a people never surpassed in the quality that makes true greatness by any nation in the Eastern Hemisphere. I shall be glad in every proper way to help to draw the bonds of friendship and of kinship which happily now exist in such strength. But I confess I am humiliated when an American talks of gratitude to any other country for affording the United States its countenance or protection in the pursuit of any course this country may deem it her duty pursue. I am not willing to be dependent on the power of England, either for defense or for protection. Certainly I desire no entangling alliances with her. Still less am I willing to have my countrymen accept the Chinese estimate—"American No. 3 Englishman."

I have failed to discover in the speech, public or private, of the advocates of this war, or in the press which supports it and them, a single expression anywhere of a desire to do justice to the people of the Philippine Islands, or of a desire to make known to the people of the United States the truth of the case. Some of them, like the Senator from Indiana and the President of the Senate, are outspoken in their purpose to retain the Philippine Islands forever, to govern them ourselves, or to do what they call giving them such share in government as we hereafter may see fit, having regard to our own interest, and, as they sometimes add, to theirs. The others say, "Hush! We will not disclose our purpose just now. Perhaps we may," as they phrase it, "give them liberty some time. But it is to be a long time first."

The catchwords, the cries, the pithy and pregnant phrases of which all their speech is full, all mean dominion. They mean perpetual dominion. When a man tells you that the American flag must not be hauled down where it has once floated, or demands of a shouting audience, "Who will haul it down?" if he mean anything, he means that that people shall be under our dominion forever. The man who says, "We will not treat with them till they submit; we will not deal with men in arms against the flag," says, in substance, the same thing. One thing there has been, at least, given to them as Americans not to say. There is not one of these gentlemen who will rise in his place and affirm that if he were a Filipino he would not do exactly as the Filipinos are doing; that he would not despise them if they were to do otherwise. So much, at least, they owe of respect to the dead and buried history—the dead and buried history, so far as they can slay and bury it—of their country.

Why, the tariff schemes which are proposed are schemes in our interest and not in theirs. If you propose to bring tobacco from Porto Rico or from the Philippine Islands on the ground that it is for the interest of the people whom you are undertaking to govern, for their best interests to raise it and sell it to you, every imperialist in Connecticut will be up in arms. The nerve in the pocket is still sensitive, though the nerve in the heart may be numb. You will not let their sugar come here to compete with the cane sugar of Louisiana or the beet sugar of California or the Northwest, and in determining that question you mean to think not of their interest but of yours. The good government you are to give them is a government under which their great productive and industrial interests, when peace comes, are to be totally and absolutely disregarded by their government. You are not only proposing to do that, but you expect to put another strain on the Constitution to accomplish it.

Why, Mr. President, the atmosphere of both legislative chambers, even now, is filled with measures proposing to govern and tax these people for our interest, and not for theirs. Your men who are not alarmed at the danger to constitutional liberty are up in arms when there is danger to tobacco. As an eloquent Republican colleague said elsewhere, "Beware that you do not create another Ireland under the American flag." Beware that you do not create many other Irelands—another Ireland in Porto Rico; another Ireland in Cuba; many other Irelands in the Philippines! The great complaint of Ireland for eight centuries was that England framed her taxation and regulated her tariff, not for Ireland's interest, but for her own. That when she dealt with the great industries of that beautiful isle she was thinking of the English exchequer and of the English manufacturer and of the English land-owner; and she reduced Ireland to beggary. Let us not repeat that process.

Is there any man so bold as to utter in seriousness the assertion that where the American flag has once been raised it shall never be hauled down? I have heard it said that to haul down or to propose to haul down this national emblem where it has once floated is poltroonery. Will any man say it was poltroonery when Paul Jones landed on the northeast coast of England that he took his flag away with him when he departed? Was Scott a poltroon, or was Polk a poltroon? Was Taylor a poltroon? Was the United States a nation of poltroons when they retired from the City of Mexico or from Vera Cruz without leaving the flag behind them? Were we poltroons when we receded from Canada? If we had made the attack on the coast of Spain, at one time contemplated during this very war, were we pledged to hold and govern Spain forever or disgraced in the eyes of mankind if we failed to do it? Has England been engaged in the course of poltroonery all these years when she has retired from many a field of victory? According to this doctrine, she was bound to have held Belgium forever after the battle of Waterloo and Spain forever after Corunna and Talavera. She could not, of course, have retired with honor from Venezuela if the arbitration had not ended in her favor.

Mr. President, this talk that the American flag is never to be removed where it has once floated is the silliest and wildest rhetorical flourish ever uttered in the ears of an excited populace. No baby ever said anything to another baby more foolish.

Now, what are the facts as to the Philippine Islands and the American flag? We have occupied a single city, part of one of four hundred islands, and with a population of 120,000 or thereabouts out of 10,000,000. The Spanish forces were invested and hemmed in by the people of those islands, who had risen to assert their own freedom when we got there. Now, what kind of Americanism, what kind of patriotism, what kind of love of liberty is it to say that we are to turn our guns on that patriot people and wrest from them the freedom that was almost within their grasp and hold these islands for our own purposes in subjection and by right of conquest because the American flag ought not to be hauled down where it has once floated, or, for the baser and viler motive still, that we can make a few dollars a year out of their trade?

Mr. President, this is the doctrine of purest ruffianism and tyranny. There is nothing of the Declaration of Independence in it. There is nothing of the Constitution of the United States in it. There is nothing of the fathers in it. There is nothing of George Washington in it, or of Thomas Jefferson. There is nothing in it of the old Virginia or of the old South Carolina or of the old Massachusetts. If every territory over which the flag of a country has once floated must be held and never shall be yielded again to the nation to which it belonged, every war between great and powerful nations must be a war of extermination or a war of dishonor alike to the victor and to the vanquished.

We expected, did we not, at the time of our declaration of war that we would not wrest Cuba from Spain for any purpose of our own aggrandizement, but only that there might be established there a free government for the people thereof, and that the people of Cuba were, and of right ought to be, a free, independent state; that our flag would float in Cuba while the operation of the war was going on as it has floated in glory and in honor. Was that a pledge to a course which should dishonor and degrade the flag of our country in the face of mankind? Who shall haul it down when the time comes? The man who signed his name to that promise, a man with whose name no thought of dishonor or degradation to his country's flag was ever associated, will keep his own honor and that of the country and that of the flag unstained by hauling it down himself.

I tell my friends who appeal to the flag of the country, and who say that no matter what question of righteousness, or justice, or constitutional power may be up, they stand with the flag, and follow the drum, and listen to nothing but the sound of the trumpet, and care only for the men in uniform, and postpone all questions of liberty or of humanity till the martial music is silent and the clash of arms is over and the flag is furled. I tell these friends of mine that the American flag is a higher and a more sacred thing to me than it is to them. I love the flag, not as a bit of colored bunting, not for its bright colors or its floating folds, but as a holy and as a sacred symbol. The American flag is dear to my heart because it seems something more, and something loftier, and something nobler than is represented by the flag of any other country. I mean, if I can, to keep its pure folds free from stain. In the old days of slavery the great English poet Campbell excited the anger of the American people by a stinging satire:

"United States, your banner wears
Two emblems—one of fame;
Alas, the other that it bears
Reminds us of your shame."

"Your standard's constellation types
White freedom by its stars;
But what's the meaning of the stripes?
They mean your negroes' scars."

What said the liberty-loving leaders of those great generations? Did they say: "If the flag typify slavery, we are for slavery; if the flag stand for oppression, we are oppressors forever more." No. They said: "If the flag shall wave over the great territory between the Mississippi and the Pacific, it shall wave over a free territory."

When the authority of the United States, in the days of Franklin Pierce and James Buchanan, undertook to subjugate the free men of Kansas and Nebraska, they stood for their freedom. They denied the right of James Buchanan or of Franklin Pierce to make this holy symbol the emblem of the government of man, or any race of men, against its will.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that these are grave questions. They are things worth thinking of by American Senators and American statesmen. They go down to the roots of our national life. They are not of yesterday, of to-day, or to-morrow alone. They were thought of when our country was settled. They were debated during the century's long strife that preceded the Revolution. The minds of the Fathers were full of them. Their answer to them was written in the imperisable lines of the Declaration of Independence, and in the constitutions of the States and of the nation. We have been brought up to think of them through the whole of our first century of greatness and of glory. We reaffirmed our doctrine about them again when we celebrated our centennial in 1876. They were daily and nightly on the thoughts of Abraham Lincoln and Charles Sumner. If Lincoln and Sumner should repeat what they thought of them now, they would be denounced as "little Americans," as "squaw men," and blacklisted as traitors.

Now, what is the answer we get when we repeat the old doctrine, not in our own language, but in the language of the Fathers, and of Lincoln, and of Sumner? Why, the answer—there are some creditable exceptions—but in general the answer we get is that there is a soldier in uniform somewhere shooting somebody; that the American flag is flying, and some poor devils, who run when they come in sight of it, half armed, half disciplined, half clad, half fed, have got these ideas into their heads also, and are fighting for them and dying for them, and thinking we are invading them and are firing at our flag. Are you afraid of them? No. Are they formidable? No. Does the condition, according to your theory, of foreign war exist? No. But so long as the flag of of the United States, standing for seventy million people—the richest, strongest, brightest, as we claim, on the face of the earth, anywhere the wide world over, is resisted there can be no question of liberty, honor, constitutional liberty, or national obligation considered throughout this broad continent. Why, Mr. President, if this be true, and there is nothing to be talked about but uniforms and flags and drums and trumpets till the last Filipino is dead in the last ditch, Aguinaldo has beaten you already. He has driven you to eat the bravest word you ever spoke. He has driven you to spit on the memory of your Fathers; to trample on your oaths to support the Constitution; to substitute an empty drum for your brains, and a fife for your conscience; and to do your thinking from this time forward, not with your head, but with your heels.

Certainly the flag should never be lowered from any moral field over which it has once waved. To follow the flag is to follow the principles of freedom and humanity for which it stands. To claim that we must follow it when it stands for injustice or oppression is like claiming that we must take the nostrums of the quack doctor who stamps it on his wares, or follow every scheme of wickedness or fraud, if only the flag be put at the head of the prospectus. The American flag is in more danger from the imperialists than there would be if the whole of Christendom were to combine its power against it. Foreign violence at worst could only rend it. But these men are trying to stain it.

It is claimed—what I do not believe—that these appeals have the sympathy of the American people. It is said that the statesman who will lay his ear to the ground will hear their voice. I do not believe it. The voice of the American people does not come from the ground. It comes from the sky. It comes from the free air. It comes from the mountains, where liberty dwells. Let the statesman who is fit to deal with the question of liberty or to utter the voice of a free people lift his ear to the sky—not lay it to the ground.

Mr. President, it was once my good fortune to witness an impressive spectacle in this Chamber, when the Senators answered to their names in rendering solemn judgment in a great State trial. By a special provision each Senator was permitted, when he cast his vote, to state his reason in a single sentence. I have sometimes fancied that the question before us now might be decided not alone by the votes of us who sit here to-day, but of the great men who have been our predecessors in this Chamber and in the Continental Congress from the beginning of the Republic.

Would that that roll might be called. The solemn assembly sits silent while the Chair puts the question whose answer is so fraught with the hopes of liberty and the destiny of the Republic.

The roll is called. George Washington: "No. Why should we quit our own, to stand on foreign ground?"

Alexander Hamilton: "No. The Declaration of Independence is the fundamental constitution of every State."

Thomas Jefferson: "No. Governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. Every people ought to have that separate and equal station among the nations of the world to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them."

John Adams: "No. I stood by the side of Jefferson when he brought in the Declaration; I was its champion on the floor of Congress. After our long estrangement, I come back to his side again."

James Madison: "No. The object of the Federal Constitution is to secure the union of the thirteen primitive States, which we know to be practicable, and to add to them such other States as may arise in their own bosoms or in their neighborhood, which we can not doubt will be practicable."

Thomas Corwin: "No. I said in the days of the Mexican war: 'If I were a Mexican, as I am an American, I would welcome you with bloody hands to hospitable graves'; and Ohio to-day honors and loves me for that utterance beyond all her other sons."

Daniel Webster: "No. Under our Constitution there can be no dependencies. Wherever there is in the Christian and civilized world a nationality of character, then a national government is the necessary and proper result. There is not a civilized and intelligent man on earth that enjoys satisfaction with his condition if he does not live under the government of his own nation, his own country. A nation can not be happy but under a government of its own choice. When I depart from these sentiments I depart from myself."

William H. Seward: "No. The framers of the Constitution never contemplated colonies or provinces at all. They contemplated States only; nothing less than States—perfect States, equal States, sovereign States. There is reason, there is sound political wisdom, in this provision of the Constitution—excluding colonies, which are always subject to oppression, and excluding provinces, which always tend to corrupt and enfeeble and ultimately to break down the parent State."

John Marshall: "No. The power to declare war was not conferred upon Congress for the purpose of aggression or aggrandizement. A war declared by Congress can never be presumed to be waged for the purpose of conquest or the acquisition of territory, nor does the law declaring the war imply an authority to the President to enlarge the limits of the United States by subjugating the enemy's country."

John Quincy Adams: "No. The territories I helped bring into the nation were to be dwelt in by free men and made into free States."

Aaron Burr: "Yes. You are repeating my buccaneering expedition down the Mississippi. I am to be vindicated at last!"

Abraham Lincoln: "No. I said in Independence Hall at Philadelphia, just before I entered upon my great office, that I rested upon the truth Thomas Jefferson has just uttered, and that I was ready to be assassinated, if need be, in order to maintain it. And I was assassinated in order to maintain it."

Charles Sumner: "No. I proclaimed it when I brought in Alaska. I sealed my devotion with my blood, also. It was my support and solace through those many long and weary hours when the red-hot iron pressed upon my spine, the very source and origin of agony, and I did not flinch. He knows our country little, little also of that great liberty of ours, who supposes that we could receive such a transfer. On each side there is impossibility. Territory may be conveyed, but not a people."

William McKinley—William McKinley: "There has been a cloud before my vision for a moment, but I see clearly now; I go back to what I said two years ago: 'Forcible annexation is criminal aggression; governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, not of some of them, but of all of them.' I will stand with the Fathers of the Republic. I will stand with the founders of the Republican party. No."

Mr. President, I know how imperfectly I have stated this argument. I know how feeble is a single voice amid this din and tempest, this delirium of empire. It may be that the battle for this day is lost. But I have an assured faith in the future. I have an assured faith in justice and the love of liberty of the American people. The stars in their courses fight for freedom. The Ruler of the heavens is on that side. If the battle to-day go against it, I appeal to another day, not distant and sure to come. I appeal from the clapping of hands and the stamping of feet and the brawling and the shouting to the quiet chamber where the Fathers gathered in Philadelphia. I appeal from the spirit of trade to the spirit of liberty. I appeal from the Empire to the Republic. I appeal from the millionaire, and the boss, and the wire-puller, and the manager to the statesman of the elder time, in whose eyes a guinea never glistened, who lived and died poor, and who left to his children and to his countrymen a good name far better than riches. I appeal from the Present, bloated with material prosperity, drunk with the lust of empire, to another and a better age. I appeal from the Present to the Future and to the Past. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Visitors in the galleries will please remember that under the rules of the Senate no expressions of approval or disapproval are permitted, and if there is a repetition of the applause the Sergeant-at-Arms will be required to clear the galleries at once.

APPENDIX.

The Government of the Filipinos has considered it its duty to expound before the civilized nations the happenings which caused a rupture of its formerly friendly relations with the army of the United States in these islands in order that they should come to be convinced that on my side everything has been done to avoid said rupture, even at the cost of many rights which were thus sacrificed without use.

After the naval battle, which had taken place on the 1st of May, between the American and the Spanish squadron the commanding officer of the latter consented to my return from Hongkong to this beloved soil, and distributed even amongst the Filipinos a number of rifles found in the arsenal at Cavite, without doubt for the purpose that I should again start the revolution, which, owing to the treaty of Biak-na-Bato, had become extinct to some extent, and in order to secure thus the help of the Filipinos.

At the outbreak of the hostilities between America and Spain the inhabitants had fully comprehended that now the moment had come to take up again the arms in behalf of their struggle for liberty, they being sure that the latter nation would be vanquished and would never again be in a position to lead them on to the way of prosperity and progress; they, therefore, rejoiced at my arrival, and I had the honor to be chosen their chief, owing to the services which I had been able to render in the previous revolution. Thereupon all Filipinos, without distinction of rank and classes, took up arms, and each province hastened to drive the Spanish troops from within its boundaries. Thus it it explained how it is possible that, after so short a time, my Government dominates to-day over the whole of Luzon, in the Visayan Islands, and in a part of Mindanao.

Although the Americans have not had any share whatever in the military operations that have cost so much blood and money, my Government is ready to acknowledge that the destruction of the Spanish squadron and the turning over to us of a number of rifles from the arsenal has had a certain influence on the progress of our army. Besides that, it seemed a matter of certainty that the American troops would needs have to sympathize with a revolution which they fomented, and which has saved them so much blood and fatigues, and, above all, I had such unbounded confidence in the history and the traditions of a nation which had fought for independence and against slavery, and which appeared as the champion of liberty of the oppressed and downtrodden nations.

Seeing the Filipinos thus friendly disposed toward them, the Americans disembarked their forces at Parañaque and took positions along the whole line occupied by my troops as far as Maytubig, taking hold by means of astuteness not free from force of a great many trenches constructed by my sappers; they caused the garrison of Manila to surrender, which, owing to its being hedged in by my forces, had to surrender after the first attack, in which I took a most active part, although I had not been notified of its date, my troops advancing as far as Malate, Ermita, Pako, Sampalok, and Tondo, all parts of Manila.

Notwithstanding these services, and although the Spaniards would surely not have surrendered had not my troops cut off all possibility of a retreat to the interior, the American generals not only did not even mention me when stipulating the details of the capitulation, but they moreover demanded the withdrawal of my troops from the port of Cavite, and from the suburbs of Manila.

I submitted to the American generals that I had not been treated justly, and I asked them in courteous terms that they should acknowledge at least to some extent my cooperation, but they were deaf to my entreaties.

Being all the same desirous of showing friendship and good feeling toward those who pronounced themselves the liberators of the Philippine nation, I withdrew my troops from the port of Cavite, and from the suburbs of Ermita, Malate, Sampalok, and Tondo, only retaining a part of the suburb of Pako.

In spite of these concessions, it lasted but a few days before Admiral Dewey, without any given motive, took away our launches, which with special consent of his had been stationed in the Bay of Manila. Almost at the same time I received a letter from General Otis, commander in chief of the American army of occupation, demanding that I should withdraw my troops from the territory which he had pointed out in a plan accompanying said letter, the territory including even the township of Pandakan and the quarter of Singalong, which had never belonged to the city limits.

In view of this unqualifiable proceeding of the two American chiefs I held a war council, and consulted also the opinion of my privy council, and in agreement with the opinion given by them I nominated commissioners, who were to come to an understanding with the above.

Although the reception accorded by Admiral Dewey to my commissioners was anything but pleasant, he not even allowing them to speak to him, I nevertheless conceded to the friendly entreaties of General Otis, withdrawing my army to the territory pointed out by him, in order to avoid all contract with his troops—a matter that had come to cause a good deal of trouble; when doing this I confidently hoped that, the conference at Paris having come to an end, my people would obtain the freedom promised to them by Mr. Pratt, the consul-general at Singapore, and that then the friendship which so often had been expressed in the manifestations and speeches of the American generals who had come to these parts would be definitely insured.

Matters, however, did not turn out that way: The generals referred to considered the delegates which I had sent to them in the behalf of peace as a proof of my weakness; and thus it happened that, their ambitious designs increasing, they sent a force to Iloilo on the 26th of December last in order to seize as conquerors that part of the Philippines which also belonged to my government.

Such a proceeding which is so far removed from the line of action followed by the civilized nations, entitles me to proceed without any further consideration. But nevertheless, in order to be correct in my actions up to the end, I sent commissioners to General Otis, asking him to desist from so temerarious an undertaking. The same were, however, not listened to.

My government can not remain indifferent in view of a violent and aggressive usurpation of a part of its territory by a nation which has styled itself the champion of the oppressed people; and it is, therefore, ready to start hostilities, should the Americans try to carry out the occupation of the Bisayan Islands.

I denounce these actions before the whole world, in order that the public conscience should, by its inflexible judgment, clearly designate those who really are the oppressors and the hangmen of humanity.

On their heads may fall all the blood which will be spilled.

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

MALOLOS, January 5, 1899.

"Revolucion" of the 19th of January, 1900.

BENJAMIN F. BURGESS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 743) to relieve Benjamin F. Burgess of the charge of desertion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate shall presently consider a bill which will be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War is authorized to remove from the record of Benjamin F. Burgess, a private of Company C, First Battalion Maine Infantry Volunteers, the charge of desertion and to issue to him a discharge as of date June 17, 1865: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or allowance shall accrue to said Burgess by this act.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to state that I ask present consideration for this bill by request of the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. There is a report in its favor from the Military Committee, Report No. 548, of the present Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BELLE BEAN.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Montana yields, that I may present a report from the Committee on Pensions. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4215) granting a pension to Belle Bean, to report it favorably without amendment, and as this is a bill granting $8 a month to a poor widow, I ask unanimous consent that it be now considered.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Belle Bean, widow of Leonard W. Bean, late of Company E, First Regiment New Hampshire Cavalry Volunteers, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month and $2 per month additional for her minor child, Amanda F. Bean, until the child reaches the age of 16 years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3419, known as the Alaska bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill known as the Alaska bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CLAIMS OF CERTAIN STATES AND THE CITY OF BALTIMORE.

Mr. DANIEL. By the courtesy of the Senator from Montana, I wish to call up a bill. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4024) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to reexamine and resettle the accounts of certain States and the city of Baltimore growing out of moneys expended by said States and the city of Baltimore for military purposes during the war of 1812.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. CARTER. I yielded with the understanding that the bill will be withdrawn if it leads to any protracted discussion.

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir; if there is any objection. The bill has passed several times, I will state, and I think it is very well understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read at length heretofore. Is there objection to its present consideration?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH].

Mr. SPOONER. I suggest that the amendment be read.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 73, on page 469, and in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 73. That persons who are not citizens of the United States, or who prior to making location had not legally declared their intention to become such, shall not be permitted to locate, hold, or convey mining claims in said district of Alaska, nor shall any title to a mining claim acquired by location or purchase through any such person or persons be legal. In any civil action, suit, or proceeding to recover the possession of a mining claim, or for the appointment of a receiver, or for an injunction to restrain the working and operation of a mining claim, it shall be the duty of the court to inquire into and determine the question of the citizenship of the locator: Provided, That no location of a mining claim shall hereafter be made in the district of Alaska by any person or persons through an agent or attorney in fact, and all locations heretofore made by any person or persons through an agent or attorney in fact upon which $100 worth of labor or improvements had not been expended or made within ninety days first succeeding the date of such location are hereby declared to be null and void.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, to the latter clause of that amendment I have, so far as I now know, no objection.

Mr. STEWART. Is that to apply immediately?

Mr. SPOONER. To apply immediately. So far as the amendment is prospective in its operation I have no objection to it. The amendment, so far as it is a retrospective proposition, seems to me to be one entirely vicious. Upon what principle it is supported or upon what argument it is sustained I have not learned. When it was debated I was absent from the Chamber and from the city.

This bill is to provide a civil code for Alaska, Mr. President, in the main, I suppose—in fact, I know—carefully prepared. It seems to me that it should contain no provision which could interfere in any way with the private rights heretofore accrued in that Territory. Retrospective legislation affecting individual rights, if within the power of the legislature, is generally abhorrent.

My attention has been called to this particular amendment by constituents of mine who are interested in it. What is behind the proposition I do not know. That it is exceptional in its character—unique—I think is very clear. A wiser course for Congress to pursue, so far as questions touching the validity of existing rights in that Territory or in any other Territory are concerned, is to leave those questions to be determined by the courts. If anyone in Alaska claims title to a mine under proceedings which are invalid, we have provided hitherto, and we provide by this bill, tribunals for the determination of the validity of such titles or claims—tribunals where every man interested can have his day in court, and where if a subordinate or inferior tribunal, in the judgment of either party, errs, an appeal can be taken. This is not a tribunal which ought by its decree either to attempt the solution in a legislative way of matters of private right or to cast clouds upon the titles or alleged titles of the men who hold them.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, as I said the other day, I think this is an important question, and I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to yield to me a moment.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senate ought to be here, and I want to call the attention of the Presiding Officer to the fact that there is not a quorum present and ask to have the roll called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon,	Frye,	McLaurin,	Simon,
Bard,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Spooner,
Bate,	Hanna,	Martin,	Stewart,
Berry,	Hansbrough,	Mason,	Sullivan,
Burrows,	Harris,	Money,	Teller,
Carter,	Hawley,	Nelson,	Tillman,
Chandler,	Heitfeld,	Perkins,	Turley,
Clark, Wyo.	Jones, Ark.	Pettus,	Turner,
Cockrell,	Kean,	Platt, Conn.	Vest,
Daniel,	Kenney,	Rawlins,	Warren,
Davis,	Lodge,	Ross,	Wellington.
Deboe,	McComas,	Scott,
Foraker,	McCumber,	Sewell,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I repeat—and I think every Senator here will agree with me about it—that any question of contested private right, the validity of the assignment of mining locations or the validity of mining locations, should be left to the courts to determine, and that they should not be disposed of by legislative provision declaring them invalid, or, for that matter, in a bill like this, declaring them valid. There is a certain remedy for anyone who claims that a mining location in Alaska was illegal or that any assignment of a mining location was illegal.

If it is desired or thought wise to provide here that no one but a citizen of the United States or an alien born who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States shall be permitted hereafter to locate a mining claim in Alaska, this is the proper bill in which to incorporate such a provision. That would be prospective in its operation; the whole world is bound to take notice of it; and any man who proceeds in disregard of it proceeds at his peril; but a proposition, which this is, to declare invalid locations which have been made by aliens, and to declare invalid assignments which have been made by locators—assignments not to aliens, but to American citizens who have expended large amounts of money in the development of the claims and who bought in good faith—is a proposition which ought not to commend itself to any member of the Senate.

Moreover, this amendment, as I understand it, Mr. President, violates a policy which has hitherto been announced by Congress as to the location of mining claims in Alaska. It may be well to change the policy. Of that I have nothing to say, but it should be changed, if it is to be changed at all, in language which makes the change prospective and which does not couple with it a retroactive provision, attempting to invalidate what heretofore has been done under authority of Congress. If I understand it, that is precisely what this amendment does.

I admit that under the general mining laws of the United States the right to make a mining location pertains to the citizen or to one who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States; but Congress made provision in 1883 upon this subject in a bill providing a civil government for Alaska, which was, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] said yesterday, somewhat indefinite in some of its provisions, but in other of its provisions it is not indefinite. That act says:

Provided, That the Indians or other persons in said district shall not be disturbed in the possession of any lands actually in their use or occupation or now claimed by them, but the terms under which such persons may acquire title to such lands is reserved for future legislation by Congress: And provided further, That parties who have located mines—

Not citizens of the United States, but—that parties who have located mines or mineral privileges therein under the laws of the United States applicable to the public domain, or who have occupied and improved or exercised acts of ownership over such claims, shall not be disturbed therein, but shall be allowed to perfect their title to such claims by payment as aforesaid.

It was the obvious intention of Congress there to safeguard the interests of those, regardless of citizenship, who had located claims in the district or Territory of Alaska, who had made improvements upon their claims, invested money in their claims, and to permit them to perfect their title to them. But that is not all, nor the principal statute, which, it seems to me, the Senate should keep in mind in voting upon this amendment. Chapter 363 of the laws of 1897, entitled "An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens who hold and own real estate in the Territories," provides—

That no alien or person who is not a citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in the manner provided by law, shall acquire title to or own any land in any of the Territories of the United States except as hereinafter provided.

I ask the attention of the Senate to section 2, which provides—

That this act shall not apply to land now owned in any of the Territories of the United States by aliens which was acquired on or before March 3, 1887, so long as it is held by the then owners, their heirs or legal representatives, nor to any alien who shall become a bona fide resident of the United States—

Not a citizen of the United States, but "bona fide resident of the United States"— and any alien who shall become a bona fide resident of the United States, or shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in the manner provided by law, shall have the right to acquire and hold lands in either of the Territories of the United States upon the same terms as citizens of the United States.

The Supreme Court, in the case of the Steamer Coquitlam vs. The United States, reported in 163 United States, at page 352, decided that Alaska is one of the Territories of the United States; so that this statute applies to Alaska. But that is not all, Mr. President, for the statute says:

Provided, That if any such resident alien shall cease to be a bona fide resident of the United States, then such alien shall have ten years from the time he ceases to be such bona fide resident in which to alienate such lands.

Nor is that all.

This act shall not be construed to prevent any persons not citizens of the United States—

Could anything be plainer?

This act shall not be construed to prevent any persons not citizens of the United States from acquiring or holding lots or parcels of lands in any incorporated or platted city, town, or village, or in any mine or mining claim, in any of the Territories of the United States.

Congress by this act distinctly declared, while the rule should be against alien ownership of land in the Territories, that a bona fide resident alien might acquire and hold lands in the Territories, and so far as mining claims were concerned, distinctly declared:

This act shall not be construed to prevent any persons not citizens of the United States from acquiring or holding lots or parcels of lands in any incorporated or platted city, town, or village, or in any mine or mining claim, in any of the Territories of the United States

Nor is that all. Section 4 of this act provides:

That any alien who shall hereafter hold lands in any of the Territories of the United States in contravention of the provisions of this act may nevertheless convey his title thereto at any time before the institution of escheat proceedings as hereinafter provided.

There is distinct authority, unequivocal authority, for an alien to acquire mining claims in the Territory of Alaska, and there is unequivocal authority for an alien to acquire land in any of the Territories of the United States, with a provision that, even if acquired in contravention of the provisions of this act, he might make a lawful conveyance of it at any time prior to the escheat proceedings provided for under this chapter, which were to be taken in the name of the United States; and yet this proposed amendment, as I understand, operating retrospectively, attempts to declare void not only all locations made in Alaska by aliens, even if they be bona fide residents of Alaska, but all assignments made by aliens and resident locators of mining claims without regard to the good faith in which they were made or the expenditure of money with which, under the assignment, mining claims have been developed and the work of development has been prosecuted.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take the time of the Senate. If they want to change the policy of the future, if it is wise to do it, I have no objection to it; if it is desired to provide that hereafter no alien shall locate a mining claim in the Territory of Alaska, I have no objection to it if it commends itself to the wisdom of the Senate; if it is desired to provide that hereafter no assignment of a mining claim by an alien locator shall be valid, I have no quarrel with that, if it is wise legislative policy to so declare; but I do protest, Mr. President, against the proposition to be incorporated in the civil code of Alaska that claims which have been heretofore located under the authority of the United States, under the authority of an act of Congress, mining claims heretofore assigned to American citizens by the locator as distinctly authorized by law, shall be declared invalid. It is retroactive; and such legislation could only be redeemed from infamy, almost, by its invalidity.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SPOONER. I do.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to section 7, of chapter 363, the same section from which he has just been reading. I will ask the Senator what construction he places upon that section?

Mr. SPOONER. Section 7 reads as follows:

That this act shall not in any manner be construed to refer to the District of Columbia, nor to authorize aliens to acquire title from the United States to any of the public lands of the United States or to in any manner affect or change the laws regulating the disposal of the public lands of the United States. And the act of which this act is an amendment shall remain in force and unchanged by this act so far as it refers to or affects real estate in the District of Columbia.

I suppose that excludes aliens from the exercise of rights under the homestead law, and also——

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARTER. I think the Senator, upon reflection, will find that another construction is applicable. There is a marked and clear distinction between the right to locate a mining claim on the public domain and the right to hold a claim after purchase subsequent to the location. I think the alien land act contemplated, in allowing mining claims to become the property of aliens, the sale with the utmost freedom of located mining claims irrespective of the nationality of the purchaser; but it never was intended by that law, nor has any court in the country ever so held, to give unto the alien primary rights to go upon the public domain and make a location of his own, and to thereafter acquire title direct from the Government.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, Mr. President, it may be that no court, until the Senator from Montana has just rendered his decision, has ever declared under this act——

Mr. CARTER. I rendered no decision. I merely announced facts.

Mr. SPOONER. That the law does not give to the alien the right to locate a mining claim and acquire it.

Mr. CARTER. Does the Senator contend that it does?

Mr. SPOONER. I do contend that it does. This act is "An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories." It says:

That no alien or person who is not a citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in the manner provided by law, shall acquire title to or own any land in any of the Territories of the United States except as hereinafter provided.

It says further:

This act shall not be construed to prevent any persons not citizens of the United States "from acquiring or holding lots or parcels of lands in any incorporated or platted city, town, or village, or in any mine or mining claim, in any of the Territories of the United States."

Evidently the policy of Congress as to the acquisition and holding by aliens of mining claims was different from the policy of Congress in permitting or as to permitting aliens to acquire and hold lands under the general land laws of the United States. If anything is clear——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to make a suggestion bearing on this question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I think the true answer to the statement made by the Senator from Montana is this peculiarity in the mining law. A miner can explore and locate a mining claim and hold it year after year if he makes a hundred dollars' worth of improvements, without making a final entry or procuring a patent. I think and agree with the Senator from Montana, when it comes to the final act of procuring a patent, as in the case of other land entries, then a man has to be either a citizen of the United States or have declared his intention to become such. But, as I said, mining claims are different from all other land entries in this, that a man can locate and explore a mining claim without ever getting a fee title. He can simply be an occupant, go on and do a hundred dollars' worth of work every year, and in that way keep up his title as long as he lives.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly, Mr. President, this is clear: It was the intention of this act not to preclude an alien from acquiring mining claims in the Territories or from holding mining claims in the Territories, and in that respect the policy of Congress as to mining claims differed from the policy of Congress as to the acquisition and holding of lands generally by aliens in the Territories. But this is clear, that where one had acquired the title to a mining claim, although in contravention of the act, what does the Senator say to that?—

That any alien who shall hereafter hold lands in any of the Territories of the United States in contravention of the provisions of this act—

You may apply that to mining claims or you may extend it to an agricultural land entry if you choose—may nevertheless convey his title thereto at any time before the institution of the escheat proceeding as hereinafterp rovided.

Nor is that all. After the escheat proceeding is begun, the original acquisition having been made by an alien, this law gives him a right to perfect his title by making declaration of citizenship.

Mr. CARTER. There is no question about that.

Mr. SPOONER. It was intended obviously by this statute, and it is industriously prepared with reference to that to safeguard certain rights and interests in the Territories of resident aliens and other aliens against confiscation.

I wish to call attention again to section 4 in connection with section 7:

That any alien who shall hereafter own lands in any of the Territories of the United States in contravention of the provisions of this act.

In violation of the provisions of this act, making a case in which the court would be obliged, if the alien did not declare his intention to become a citizen seasonably, to escheat the land, may nevertheless convey it before the escheat proceedings are begun and pass good title to it, because it will not be imputed to Congress that this right to convey by an alien who has acquired it in violation of a statute is to be an empty thing. It was to protect bona fide purchasers, because a man can not always ascertain in a remote region whether the person through whom he takes an assignment or a conveyance has declared his intention or not.

Now, why should not this be left to the courts? It was the policy of Congress here to permit the alien to hold unless his title was attacked by the United States. This was a well-considered act of Congress. It was carefully drawn to prevent injustice. It was drawn, so far as these provisions are concerned, with sole reference to that. It was not drawn in the interest of men who, on technical grounds, desired to jump the claims of others, the assignees of aliens, or aliens themselves. It was to guard against such injustice as that, I take it, that Congress gave the right to an alien whose claim was being contested to perfect his title to it by making his declaration of citizenship. Anyway, why not leave this to the courts to determine? If the United States brings suit to escheat a mine located upon ground that was located by an alien he is invited into court; he is informed of the cause of action against him; he is given his day in court, and he is given his opportunity under this law to become a citizen and perfect his title. No such thing as that is proposed by this amendment. It is proposed to cut him off. It is proposed to repeal this law as to Alaska only. Why? For whom is it proposed? What special interest is behind it?

These matters should be regulated by laws general ordinarily in their operation. There should be no special law affecting titles in this way for Alaska. If there is any reason for the proposition that Congress shall repeal this act as to Alaska, shall usurp the functions of the courts, shall declare invalid assignments and locations which under this law, I think, would be valid, and which, beyond any question, could be made valid by a declaration of the locator to become a citizen, I should like to know what the reason is. Of course I acquit Senators—I need not say that—from any possible motive, except a good one, in framing this amendment; but if there is any reason why this retroactive provision should be incorporated in a civil code for Alaska I have not heard what it is.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I sincerely regret the interjection of this debated and debatable question in connection with this code. The Committee on Territories steadily resisted all efforts from all quarters looking to the incorporation in this proposed code of laws of any question liable to lead to any extended debate. The bill as prepared enacts certain general laws following in the main the laws of the State of Oregon and provides certain lines of procedure in addition to making provision for necessary officers to administer the laws.

After the bill reached this Chamber certain Senators objected to the section known as section 73, to which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] presented an amendment. When that section was drawn to my attention it seemed to me improper that it should be continued in the bill, and I thought it ought to have been stricken out. The Senator from North Dakota, however, felt that the situation required an affirmative statement relative to the subject-matter on which his amendment dwells. I would that this mining question had not been thrust into this bill, but unfortunately it is here and some disposition must be made of it. I know the Senate will do that which is wise and fair. I for one am unqualifiedly opposed to any species of legislation calculated to interfere with existing rights or the status of existing lawsuits. It seems to me that where parties have gone into court upon a given state of facts in the light of the law at the time it is unfortunate and frequently very unjust later to change the law as applicable to the facts.

But this debate has developed another thought which I think every Senator is concerned in meeting fairly. The suggestion has been made that any alien may proceed to the district of Alaska and locate a mining claim without any regard whatever to the place of his birth or his future intentions with reference to the Government of the United States. The Senator from Wisconsin, to whose attention I called what seemed to me a reasonable construction of the alien land act, went beyond the question of holding and acquiring, and insisted that that implied necessarily the right to locate. I can not conceive of a condition more undesirable to be brought about at this day than would follow from notice to the world that the district of Alaska is open to the citizens of every country, inviting the Japanese and the Koreans and all the people of the Orient, the people of Russia just across Bering Sea, to come forward and locate the gold fields of Alaska and take the treasures therein found wheresoever they might please. Such notice would be in violence of the long-established policy of the Government of the United States announced in the first law ever passed by Congress for the disposition of the mineral lands and adhered to with an unbroken line of legislation from that day to this.

Mr. President, Dutch Harbor, the common inlet to Bering Sea for shipping, is only about 400 miles farther from Yokohama than from San Francisco. Suppose we give notice to the forty-three or forty-five million people of Japan that they, without disturbing their relations to the Japanese Government or changing their relations to our own Government, may proceed to Cape Nome and Cape York and on the whole of that Alaskan coast and there participate like our own citizens in the benefits which accrue to the locator of mining claims. It would be equivalent to turning Alaska over to the aliens who might desire to come there from all over the world. Now, sir, I do not think this policy ought to be embarked upon. If any existing law is susceptible of a construction that will permit it, it ought to be changed.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Hubbard says he has brought a civil action to determine the right to certain claims located by Laplanders which Mr. Lane has bought. He is an attorney. He has filed his affidavit. He has brought civil action to determine title. This amendment provides——

Mr. CARTER. I will spare the Senator the time by stating that in so far as I am concerned I shall propose a substitute for the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. This amendment provides:

> In any civil action, suit, or proceeding to recover the possession of a mining claim, or for the appointment of a receiver, or for an injunction to restrain the working and operation of a mining claim it shall be the duty of the court to inquire into and determine the question of the citizenship of the locator.

Now, he has got his action pending, and this makes it the duty of the court to inquire into the citizenship of the locator, contrary to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. If that be the law, all right. Why come here and ask for a law to change the status of the case and to inquire into the citizenship of the locator when he could not do it otherwise.

Mr. CARTER. It was the settled law of every mining State and Territory in this Union up to a recent date that the citizenship of the locator could be put in issue by any party to an action concerning title to a mining claim.

Mr. STEWART. If that be true, let me ask the Senator why pass a law to that effect after suit is brought? Are you in favor of changing the law? Are you in favor of passing a law that will affect a particular suit after the suit is brought? Here is a proposed law that we say changes the relations of the parties. I say if that be the law, if he has the law now, let him stay in the courts. They have all the courts open to them by the general mining law. But this makes it a rule of action. If it is now a rule of action, there is no use for it. If it is a new rule of action and destroys property rights, then it is taking one man's property and giving it to another.

Mr. CARTER. I understand the Senator's question. With reference to the question, if the Senator had been a little patient I think he would have been satisfied before I concluded. I have heretofore stated that I was sorry this question had been interjected here, but since——

Mr. STEWART. Are you in favor of it or not? We want to know. You are in charge of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. You will hear to your entire satisfaction if you will permit me to answer.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have an answer to the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Montana should address the Chair and not address the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. CARTER. I am delighted to get instructions from the Senator from New Hampshire. He is always kind and considerate and a very wise counselor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am only afraid there will be a collision between the two Senators, and the rules of order will prevent that if they are observed in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators, the Chair is sure, will observe the rules which have been made for the government of the body.

Mr. CARTER. At the outset I took occasion to state what I reiterate now, to the end that the Senator from Nevada may understand, that I am unqualifiedly opposed to disturbing the relations of parties to existing lawsuits, to indulge here in retroactive legislation. But since the assertion has been made that aliens without restriction of any sort may locate mining claims in Alaska, acquire them under the mining laws of the United States, the very notice itself requires that we should pass some sort of an amendment which would meet that proposed situation. I intend before concluding here to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota, which I will ask him to accept. I will read it now for the information of Senators.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Montana permit me for a moment?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator from Montana did not understand me as antagonizing at all his suggestion that the mines there should not be left open to aliens, come from wherever they might. I made no objection to that whatever; only I stated that I wished it to be prospective.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Any right to a mining claim that has heretofore vested under the existing law could not by this kind of an act be divested, could it?

Mr. SPOONER. Probably not.

Mr. SULLIVAN. If by this kind of an act no right heretofore existent under the law can be divested, what is the objection to it?

Mr. SPOONER. It casts doubt upon the title. It impeaches, so far as Congress by legislation can do it, the validity of conveyances and assignments. It serves no useful purpose, for it is as easy to make the law prospective as it is to make it both prospective and retroactive. I never have heard before that it was an argument fairly to be urged in favor of a proposition that it would not be valid if enacted.

Mr. STEWART. It would be valid.

Mr. SPOONER. Or that it might not be valid if enacted.

Mr. STEWART. It would be valid.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know whether it would be.

Mr. STEWART. It would be valid, because the Supreme Court of the United States has over and over again held that an act of Congress can deal with public lands under all the laws—the preemption law, the mining law—until the money is accepted and the transaction is concluded so far as the purchaser is concerned. Then it becomes a vested right. Otherwise it is inchoate and subject to legislation, and until the patent is issued or the proceedings have gone so far that the money is accepted and the title is completed Congress may act, and an act of Congress will take one man's property and give it to another and he will have no recourse whatever.

Mr. CARTER. That rule, however, will not hold as to a mining claim.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not suppose it applied to mining claims. I knew it did to homesteads.

Mr. SULLIVAN. As to this provision on the second page, line 1—

> And all locations heretofore made by any person or persons through an agent or attorney in fact upon which $100 worth of labor or improvements had not been expended or made within ninety days first succeeding the date of such location are hereby declared to be null and void.

That is inchoate; that is incomplete. The title has not vested there, and I do believe that the legislation would control that. I do not believe in permitting aliens to come in and take the property that belongs to the United States and for which we have paid. I do not believe in trying by law to divest a right which has been not only vested but where they have expended a reasonable amount of money. But where they have merely located, as in the case of the Laplanders, who went there for other purposes and have gone on there and made locations with no idea, to begin with, of becoming citizens, I do not believe they should be permitted to go in there and root out American citizens and take possession of that valuable region. I do not believe in that. I do think under this last clause here you could cut off rights where they have not completed them by compliance with the law. But when the Senator from Wisconsin suggested that this thing could not be done, then I asked, how does it hurt if it can not be done by this proposed legislation?

Mr. STEWART. It seems to me——

Mr. CARTER. I wish to conclude the observations I was making.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CARTER. I was interrupted.

Mr. STEWART. I will take the floor when the Senator from Montana is through. I wish to make some observations which I think pertinent to this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is entitled to the floor. He yielded to the Senator from Nevada and then to the Senator from Mississippi. The Senator from Montana will proceed.

Mr. CARTER. I can not fully concur in the views of the Senator from Wisconsin, wherein he contends that under the act of 1884 any person, regardless of nationality, may hold a mining claim in Alaska, citizenship or declaration to become a citizen to the contrary notwithstanding. The act of 1884 was the act under which the mining laws were extended to the district of Alaska. Prior to that date no law applied to that district under which a mineral location could be made. Having in view, however, the fact that qualified persons, and in great numbers, too, had actually staked out, and had worked for many years, a great many mining claims in the district of Alaska, the legislation is made curative, and it provided, as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin—

That parties who have located mines or mineral privileges therein under the laws of the United States applicable to the public domain, or who have occupied and improved or exercised acts of ownership over such claims, shall not be disturbed therein, but shall be allowed to perfect their title to such claims by payment as aforesaid.

That is, persons who, in conformity with the general principles of the laws relating to the acquisition of mining claims on the public domain——

Mr. SPOONER. Or——

Mr. CARTER. Or who happened to hold temporary possession. A unique condition existed. The treaty of cession required us as a matter of good faith and treaty stipulation with the Empire of Russia to extend certain privileges to persons who resided in the district of Alaska at the time of cession. There were certain Indians residing in the district whose relations to the law and the Government, to its citizenship, were somewhat confused. There were certain missionaries who occupied given tracts of country, and their relations to the Government of the United States were not well defined or clearly understood. For the purpose of meeting all these varied conditions, with no intention whatever that this curative legislation should be projected into the future, but to relieve persons then being in Alaska from the misfortune which might occur because of failure of title proceeding from the absence of law at the time the title was initiated by the location this curative legislation was provided.

There was no pretense that it was intended to go into the future. It was a bill of repose, if you please. It quieted title. It eliminated the prospect of litigation. It gave poor people relief, and with the relief then and there granted to the people to whom the act applied that portion of the act fulfilled its mission and has no further relation to our law.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Montana stated a few moments ago that he would read an amendment which he intended to ask the Senator from North Dakota to accept as a substitute. I should be glad if he would read it.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator permit me for one moment before reading the amendment? The alien act of 1887, to which the Senator refers, absolutely prohibited the holding of realty within the District of Columbia and the Territories by an alien under any circumstances whatever. For many years I remember during a brief experience in the House of Representatives I contended for the repeal of that portion of the law which related to the holding of mining claims. This prohibition retarded the investment of foreign capital in the Territories. We wanted to take the mining claim out of the inhibitions of that law. We were frequently defeated in the House, but finally, however, in 1897, the present law was passed, which excepted town lots and mining claims, but provided in its last section that the general laws of the United States relating to the acquisition of title should not be disturbed.

Now, from all these laws taken together it may be possible that the Senator's conclusion is correct, that anybody can locate a mining claim in the district of Alaska. I do not think that ought to continue to be so. I believe that the man who went out and fought on our side in the Spanish-American war ought to have a little better right than the man who fought on the other side or who was over in Japan selling the necessaries of life to our troops.

I do not believe we ought to give this gold-bearing domain to persons who have not interest enough in our Government to declare their intention to become a member of the family. Yet there are some drastic features about the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota which I think might well be eliminated, and as a reasonable way out of this whole matter I suggest as a substitute to strike out sections 72 and 73——

Mr. SPOONER. There seem to be different prints. What is the page?

Mr. CARTER. It is in a different title. I assume that there are three titles in the code.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It is on page 469.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that it is on page 469.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that we strike out sections 72 and 73 and insert as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize aliens who have not declared their intention to become citizens of the United States to locate mining claims or to acquire title from the United States to any of the public lands of the United States in the district of Alaska, or to in any manner affect or change the laws regulating the disposal of the public lands of the United States in said district.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me just a moment, what will be the effect of the language "or to acquire title?"

Mr. CARTER. The purpose of the amendment is to leave the law practically as it is, I will state to the Senator, in that particular. Now, then, the amendment continues:

In any civil action, suit, or proceeding hereafter arising in the courts of said district all questions touching upon the competency of the parties to enter or locate public lands shall be considered and determined by the court.

Now, for over thirty years this was the recognized law in all the States and Territories. It is a pretty severe thing to contemplate in an ejectment suit that an alien holding his title, not having declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and a citizen compelled to stand mute and not put an issue to the fact that this defendant or plaintiff, as the case may be, is utterly incapable under the laws of the country of holding the property.

It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States that the sovereignty alone, the Government, by a proceeding in the nature of office found, a proceeding to raise the question of citizenship——

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator a question. I understood him to say that this question had been tried in the courts of the United States—that is, that the courts took jurisdiction of the question and determined whether the miner was a citizen or not. Will the Senator mention any case?

Mr. STEWART. A suit between private parties.

Mr. TELLER. A suit between private parties.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator will find that proposition, with a wilderness of authorities cited in favor of it, in the case of Tibbets et al. vs. Ah Tong, in 4 Montana. The supreme court of Montana held, in an opinion delivered by Wade, chief justice, that the right to possess a mining claim and the right to perfect title were a part of the same grant, and that neither can exist without the other. "If, therefore, the grant by assignment or conveyance falls upon an alien incapable of making a location, his possession is of no consequence."

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator wait a moment? I want to say to the Senator that the United States district judge of the United States court in the State of Colorado held to the same doctrine at one time; but the court of appeals unanimously overruled it, and that was the only case that I ever have known in a very extended mining practice where that question was ever raised, where it was allowed to be raised.

Mr. CARTER. I think, to-day, notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court and all the cases that have been adjudicated, and I have carefully read each, in an ejectment suit commenced by an alien who claimed to have located a mining claim, the alien, finding a citizen in possession claiming another location, would be compelled to plead his citizenship, or having declared his intention to become such, and could not avoid that proposition.

Mr. TELLER. That is the Senator's opinion.

Mr. CARTER. That is the opinion I have formed, deducible from the authorities.

Mr. TELLER. I am pretty familiar with what has been the practice in the Colorado courts, and I assure the Senator that I know of only one case, and that the court of appeals very promptly overruled.

Mr. CARTER. Again, in 17 Pacific Reporter, the supreme court of Idaho held—

That under the act of Congress of May 10, 1872, only citizens of the United States and persons who have declared their intention to become such can acquire any right of possession by location or otherwise of mineral lands on the public domain.

The authorities upon that subject are very numerous, and I do not believe when the Senator comes to look up the authorities (I have a list of them here) he will find that prior to the recent date any court in the West, in the mining States or Territories, denied the right of a party to a suit to raise the question of citizenship.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion, if that is so, why not rest upon it? Why do you want to come here and introduce some new rule of law? If the courts are open to that question, why not settle that question in the courts and not here?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think that rule of law has been changed by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States except in this, that I believe in an ejectment suit an alien plaintiff could not recover on the strength of his own title.

Mr. TELLER. Then let it rest there.

Mr. CARTER. But there may be other suits than ejectment. There may be suits to quiet title. I believe that the man who claims a right under the laws of the United States, and who is notoriously known not to be qualified to exercise it, should suffer the plaintiff for defendant, or the other party to the action, to put that question in issue and have it determined. I offer this suggestion——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Montana allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. CARTER. It is something that I hoped might be accepted by both sides. I think no violence will be done by allowing the question to be raised in actions hereafter.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Let me say that the Senator's amendment goes beyond that.

Mr. NELSON. I was about to remark that the Senator's amendment is clearly retroactive. If he has only one purpose to subserve, you can put it in a few words and say that hereafter no person who is not a citizen of the United States or has declared his intention to become a citizen shall be entitled to locate and to secure a mining claim, and stop with that.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to suggest to the Senator that before the mining laws are radically changed without the consideration of a committee and in a running debate, nobody knowing what is done, I propose to be heard at length. I am the author of the mining laws now in existence, every one of them. I drew them with my own hand, after submitting them to the miners, for years. I have been chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining for many years. If there is to be an amendment of the mining laws, it is legitimate that it shall be considered by a committee appointed for that purpose. I protest, and I want to be heard, and I shall take some time. There is not time to-day, but I want a couple of hours, it may be three hours. I do not propose to have the mining laws changed in this way.

Mr. CARTER. There is no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota, unless the Senator from North Dakota objects.

Mr. STEWART. I have objection to tinkering with the mining laws in this irregular way. It is too important. This bill relates to a civil code, and if we are to drag into it an amendment of the mining laws it should be considered by a committee, and I would not undertake to amend the mining laws without submitting it to the miners, as was done before, sending it out and getting comments on it. It took six years to get the information on which the mining law of 1872 was formed. It was printed every year and thousands of copies sent out, and the result of what came in was reprinted and sent out again for six years. To make mining laws here when there is a misunderstanding all around, to make mining laws in a bill which is a civil code of procedure, I shall protest against, and I want to be heard thoroughly against all interference with the mining laws in this way.

It is perfectly evident that this is to fit a particular suit. Here is the affidavit of Mr. Hubbard, the attorney, offered by the Senator from North Dakota. Mr. Hubbard swears as follows:

> Oliver P. Hubbard, being duly sworn, on oath says that he is a citizen of the United States, an attorney at law, engaged in the practice of his profession at Nome City, in the Cape Nome mining district, district of Alaska, United States of America; that he first went to Alaska in the spring of 1898; that he is a member of the law firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, of Nome City, Alaska; that the members of the firm are Edwin R. Beeman, formerly a practicing attorney of Minneapolis, Minn., and William I. Hume, formerly a practicing attorney at Portland, Oreg., and this affiant, formerly a practicing attorney at Chicago, Ill.
> Affiant says that the firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume are attorneys in a number of mining suits now pending in the United States district court for the district of Alaska; that among others are suits brought to recover the possession of certain mining claims alleged to have been staked by alien Laplanders; that these claims were located by American citizens in the months of November and December, 1898.

And so on. He is attorney for these claimants. He has a suit pending in the court, and here is an amendment to win that suit, to take it out of that court or make a new rule for determining it. It is manifestly unjust to make any amendment to the mining laws that has not been considered by a committee. On that I desire to be heard to-morrow. I want a couple of hours so that I can explain fully the history of the mining laws; and then you will see the impropriety of tinkering with such an important subject in this irregular way.

Mr. BATE. I suggest the propriety of having the amendment printed.

Mr. STEWART. Let the amendment be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be ordered printed, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BATE. It is nearly 5 o'clock, and I ask the Senator if he will give way for a motion?

Mr. STEWART. That is entirely agreeable to me. There is not a full Senate now.

Mr. BATE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. STEWART. I will retain the floor and address the Senate when the subject comes up again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 18, 1900, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATION.

Executive nomination received by the Senate April 17, 1900.

COMMISSIONER FOR ALASKA.

Hiram H. Folsom, of Alaska, to be commissioner in and for the district of Alaska, to reside at Juneau, vice Norman E. Malcolm, resigned.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 17, 1900.

GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO.

Charles H. Allen, of Massachusetts, to be the governor of Porto Rico.

PROMOTIONS IN THE MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

Passed Asst. Surg. Thomas B. Perry, of Georgia, to be surgeon in the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States.

Passed Asst. Surg. Rell M. Woodward, of Indiana, to be surgeon in the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States.

MARSHAL.

John B. Robinson, of Pennsylvania, to be marshal of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

Isaiah J. McCottrie, of South Carolina, to be collector of customs for the district of Georgetown, in the State of South Carolina.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 17, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill; and pending that motion, I would like to ask my colleague upon the other side if we can not agree upon a time to close general debate to-day?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, those of my colleagues who have used their hour agree with those who have not used their hour that the debate should last at least seven hours on our side. Our side demand the full seven hours. If none of them are prepared to speak, I suppose it would be in order to go on to the bill.

Mr. FOSS. Would the gentleman agree to close the debate at 5 o'clock to-night, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] and the other half by myself?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will agree to close the debate at 5 o'clock if none of the members of the committee on this side of the House desire to speak at that time.

The SPEAKER. There has been no request for unanimous consent.

Mr. FOSS. I would like, Mr. Speaker, some agreement, if I can get it, and I ask unanimous consent to close debate at 5 o'clock to-night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate upon this bill close at 5 o'clock to-night.

Mr. CUMMINGS. On behalf of my colleagues, the minority of the committee, I feel constrained to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOSS. Before going into Committee of the Whole, I would like to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOREING].

The SPEAKER. It is too late. The House has voted to go into Committee of the Whole.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair, for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of an appropriation bill, the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10450) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, it seems well to me, sir, that the acting chairman of the Naval Committee has called the attention of this House and of the country to the fact that this is the largest appropriation bill on behalf of the American Navy that has ever been presented to a Congress. And it seems well to me that the statement should be followed by that other, that larger appropriations in the future will be required by the Navy than even the one presented to the House at this time. I am satisfied and convinced that the American people realize this, and realize the necessity for it, because I believe the sentiment is abroad that upon the Navy depends the defense of the American people. I believe that we are realizing the fact that that institution, with a record unparalleled in the past, is capable and competent, and will be in the future the bulwark of the American defense.

At the same time, Mr. Chairman, it is well for us to call attention to the further fact that the Committee on Naval Affairs has not outlined a policy grossly extravagant, but one that is made necessary by the conditions that confront us, and because this institution, in my judgment, has not received at the hands of the American Congress in the past that liberal treatment that it should have received. Our appropriations this year—and I can speak for every member of the committee with whom I have been associated—have been scrutinized and studied as carefully as any of the appropriation bills that have been brought into the House within the five years I have been connected with that committee. There has been but one thought, one idea, and one purpose, so far as the general policy of the committee was concerned, and that has been to carefully scrutinize every item, thoroughly understand every subject, be informed upon every project and every proposed improvement.

The American Navy, Mr. Chairman, speaks for itself to-day. It has a very proud record in the history of the world, a record that every American, be he Democrat, Republican, or Populist, will rejoice to maintain in the future. There has been, unfortunately, presented for the first time from the Naval Committee a minority report upon some of the questions involved. Earnestly seeking and desiring to obtain a solution of these questions, and recognizing that it is natural for men to disagree and hold different opinions, I desire to say, in the first place, that in my judgment these disputed questions are immaterial to the general purpose and design of the bill.

Kindly, without seeking for one moment to hurt the feelings of any, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this minority report is signed by earnest, patriotic members of this committee, but by those who have had the least experience of any upon it in the past. I do not do an injustice to those members when I say that these questions are new to some of them, have come to them for the first time as members of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, while, on the other hand, they have been threshed over, considered, thought upon, investigated, and discussed by the other members of the committee for years and years.

And, Mr. Chairman, I deem it proper further to say that this minority report is signed by but one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs who has heretofore for a full term of Congress been a member of the committee.

I make this remark not for the purpose of casting any reflection upon the integrity, the patriotic purpose, or motives of these gentlemen, but solely that the House may understand that the members of this committee who for years have been discussing these abstruse and difficult questions stand to-day as a unit, both on the Republican and the Democratic side, in the conclusions which have been reached by the majority of this committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is not the gentleman from West Virginia mistaken in that statement? Did not the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] expressly state that he was against the majority of the committee in this matter of building ships in the navy-yards? I so understood him.

Mr. DAYTON. It is not necessary, Mr. Chairman, for us to enter into the details of the individual opinions of members touching some questions. I say to the gentleman that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS], the leader on the other side, upon this question, has not signed your minority report; neither has the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER], who for years has been one of the most faithful, attentive, and earnest members of this committee.

These gentlemen have for ten, twelve, or fifteen years been members of this committee, and these propositions have come before the committee time and time again. The gentleman from New York has held the responsible position of chairman of this committee when the present minority was in the majority here; and I do not understand that on any of these questions he goes to the extent of disagreeing with the majority of the committee.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is neither here nor there. I recognize the fact, and stand here to proclaim it, that if the minority is right, no matter how much or how little their experience may be, they and their views should be followed, and not ours. I want to say that the majority of the Naval Committee does not shrink from meeting any of these questions that are presented; and if we can have a fair and full and complete hearing by the members of this House we are prepared to stand or fall upon the merits of every proposition.

And, first, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the question of building ships in the navy-yards. In reference to that I wish to say that it is just and proper and right that the members of this House should bear in mind that we stand here to legislate for the country; not for any particular individual district. We stand here to protect the United States Treasury. We stand here to protect the American people from any unjust discrimination against them; and we stand here with the patriotic purpose always in view that we are to build up a navy on sea and not a navy on land; that we are to strengthen that institution which will make us respected abroad, will sustain our dignity in the courts of the world, and carry our flag with honor to the four quarters of the earth. [Applause.] And we, as public ministers, are to see to it that this is done economically, in the interest of the country, as I stated, and not in the interest of any particular district.

This proposition, Mr. Chairman, resolves itself, then, into this simple question: Is it cheaper, is it more expedient, is it better, is it more economical for us to build our ships in the American navy-yards than to build them by contract? Upon this proposition the Naval Committee has given the fairest, the fullest hearings to the advocates of this measure that, I undertake to say, has ever been given by any committee upon any question. We have called upon the very bone and sinew of this agitation to come before us. We have listened to those whose ambition in life is to carry this proposition through.

I think I make no misstatement when I say that the naval constructor, actuated by a laudable ambition which is to his credit, has no higher hope or aspiration than that he may control the land part of the American Navy, that he may have charge of the building up of this great institution, and that all the work necessary to equip and man the ships that are to carry our sailors shall be done under his direction and control. Therefore, as was stated yesterday, we have heard from the American naval constructors, and they have made out the best case, the strongest case, that could possibly be made in behalf of this proposition. Yet I undertake to say that every thoughtful, earnest man who will consider their own statements taken in connection with the statements of the Secretary of the Navy himself, who stands at the head of the whole institution—every thoughtful man who will take these statements and consider them fairly and impartially, unbiased by any prejudice in favor of these navy-yards, must reach the conclusion that this proposition is not for the best interests of the American people.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman tell this Committee of the Whole whether or not there was any outside influence brought to bear on the Naval Committee in the consideration of these questions? Does he know anything of that kind?

Mr. DAYTON. Not the slightest, that I know of. As I stated, the fairest consideration has been given to the advocates of this proposition that I have ever known to be given by any committee on any subject.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Of course I do not mean to intimate that the committee was touched by any such influence; but will the gentleman state to the House whether or not there was a lobby here to prevent the adoption of the idea advocated by the naval constructors.

Mr. DAYTON. Why, my dear sir, I never heard of such a lobby against the proposition. I might turn around and say that the only parties heard, and the only parties who pushed this matter, were the naval constructors themselves.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Oh, yes; the members of this lobby did not appear before the committee. But does the gentleman mean to say that he was not aware that the great shipbuilding firms of the United States had their representatives here to interview members of the committee?

Mr. DAYTON. I never heard of it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Then the gentleman is not as potential on the committee as I thought, because every other member of the committee knew the fact.

Mr. DAYTON. I presume my friend from Kentucky will appreciate as I proceed how much potentiality or how little I may be able to claim in this matter.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not here or there. Let me say that not a single man, either shipbuilder or anybody else, ever discussed the matter, so far as I know, with sinister motives, with or before the committee; and if they discussed it with my friend from Kentucky, I undertake to say that it was by an accident.

Now, let me call your attention to this matter a little more carefully. And first, I wish to take the views of the Secretary of the Navy himself, as expressed before the committee, and I ask the House to listen to this carefully. It was brought out incidentally by the gentleman from Kentucky himself in making some inquiries of the Secretary of the Navy. I propose now to read the testimony of the Secretary upon this very question.

In the hearings upon the increase in the Navy, not upon this subject but upon an entirely different one, this colloquy occurred:

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Can I ask the Secretary a question on an entirely different line? I do not know whether you care to express an opinion upon it or not, but, if you do not, that is a matter entirely with yourself. There has been a suggestion before the committee, and we are to have a hearing in a short time, as to the feasibility and desirability of constructing some of our ships in our own yards. What do you think of that suggestion?

Secretary LONG. My general impression is, it is not desirable, as it costs twice as much and takes twice as long. I think the records show that. In the next place, I think it is not desirable to introduce into our navy-yards something which is not permanent and continuous. There is a great desire among the laboring men in our navy-yards that we shall build these ships in them, but that will not increase the general employment of labor at all, because if the labor is not employed in the yards it will be employed outside, etc. I think, too, that there is more danger of a navy-yard becoming a factor in politics if the number of employees is so largely increased as it would be if shipbuilding were added to repairing.

If we build a ship at New York, we must build one at Norfolk, and there will be a pressure to build one at Boston, and one at Mare Island, and one at Philadelphia, and one at Port Royal and Key West and Portsmouth. Then will follow a demand for new buildings, machinery, plant, etc. If you start a ship at any one of these places, you must employ a great many men, and as soon as it is finished all these must be discharged, and then there is trouble, especially for you. On the other hand, in the business of repairing ships, there is regular, steady employment. I really think it is a great deal better in the interest of labor as it is.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. If you will pardon me, I was directing my question to the point as to whether or not it would be for the best interests of the Government.

Secretary LONG. It is shown in the cases of the Cincinnati and Raleigh and the Maine that it cost twice as much per ton.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And takes twice as long to build?

Secretary LONG. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. And do you not also from the contractors get a good class of ships?

Secretary LONG. There is no better ship than the Olympia or the Oregon.

Mr. DAYTON. Do you not think we have a better opportunity to get a better class of ships by reason of the private engineers working with the Government engineers?

Secretary LONG. We certainly get good ships.

Mr. METCALF. May I be permitted to ask a question here? Do you think it is not advisable that some of these gunboats authorized by Congress should be built at the navy-yards? As an illustration, you have discharged a number of men from the navy-yards for lack of work, and is it not desirable to always keep on hand the best skilled labor we can get in the navy-yards?

Secretary LONG. I think it is.

Mr. METCALF. It sometimes happens that there is not enough work in the repair of ships. For instance, if they had a gunboat or small cruiser—for instance, 3,000 or 4,000 tons—they could work on, you would keep these men employed all the time?

Secretary LONG. But if we have a great increase in the Navy we will have a great increase in repair, and there will be steady employment necessitated by the repair of ships.

Mr. METCALF. Would it not have a tendency, if the Government started in on that policy, to do away with any combinations on the part of large shipbuilders in the United States?

And I ask gentlemen to pay particular attention to this testimony, as I shall have occasion to refer to it again later on:

Secretary LONG. There are so many of them now—there are so many large shipbuilders that it is safe to say there hardly could be a combination.

Mr. DAYTON. You remember Admiral Hichborn said they were now two years behind in repairing?

Secretary LONG. Yes.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. In view of the large requests made by the different departments for increased buildings and increased machinery at different navy-yards for the purpose of carrying on the necessary repairs, do you think it would be advisable for them to have machinery there to build ships?

Secretary LONG. I think you would be called upon at once for an immense increase in your buildings and for new tools and machinery, and everything of that kind.

Mr. METCALF. Just in regard to the cost of building these vessels at navy-yards, is it not due to a very large extent to system of charging up the accounts?

Secretary LONG. That may enter into it; I can not say.

Mr. METCALF. I know this to be a fact, that in some of our yards, when they have exhausted the appropriation or something of that kind, they will charge to another account. I know in the building of one of the monitors at Mare Island that very course was adopted.

Secretary LONG. I think very likely that is true.

Mr. METCALF. But I have talked with a number of the foremen at one or two of the navy-yards, the men who have been in charge of practical work, and they very strongly recommend not the building of battle ships or cruisers, or anything of that kind, but to start in on building small vessels for the purpose of keeping up steady employment, and in that way being able to retain the skilled labor.

Secretary LONG. I think you would find it would result even then that just as soon as your work is finished you have a thousand men to be discharged.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the statement of the Secretary of the Navy himself.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry, or rather a correction of a statement?

Mr. DAYTON. Of a statement that I have made?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I would ask if the hearings to which my colleague refers, in the questions propounded by me to the Secretary of the Navy, they were not propounded upon the response of Admiral Hichborn that we were two years behind with our work on these vessels in repairs?

Mr. DAYTON. I was going to refer to that matter and other matters as I proceeded with the discussion.

I will refer to Admiral Hichborn's own statement in a moment.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. But there is no such statement in Admiral Hichborn's testimony that we were two years behind.

Mr. DAYTON. I understand that exactly, and I propose that the House shall have the benefit of Admiral Hichborn's statement, because I propose that the House shall know the facts. It will be borne in mind by the members of the House that Admiral Hichborn stands at the head of the construction corps and is in charge of that Bureau. I read from page 7 of the hearing:

The CHAIRMAN. Navy-yard, Boston, Mass., Construction and Improvements. That is the same as last year.

Admiral HICHBORN. Yes; I thought it was better to get the same each year. I understand every one of these navy-yards has got more than they can do at the present time. We have work at the navy-yards where orders are more than a year old now.

That is the statement. I said two years. The admiral's statement was that they had orders for repairs unfulfilled more than a year old. He further says:

All of these yards are running full, and next year we want to put the ships in condition.

Mr. GAINES. Are they employed on home work or foreign work?

Mr. DAYTON. Oh, my dear sir, I supposed it was known to every child 10 years old that our Government navy-yards do not work on foreign vessels. They are running full, and we have 42 vessels to-day that are awaiting repairs.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The gentleman refers to the Government navy-yards.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts and Mr. DRIGGS rose.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to follow this logically, if I can; and inasmuch as there are so many gentlemen who want to be heard at once, they will pardon me until I can get through with my statement. Then I will answer their questions.

Mr. GAINES. I should like to ask a question right on that point.

Mr. HOPKINS. It looks as though they wanted to make speeches in your time.

Mr. DAYTON. This is in my time, and I want to complete this statement, because I want the House to have the facts. I never have sought any partisan discussion of these questions. I have never made a speech to this House that my purpose has not been to inform it of the facts which my position on this committee enabled me to find out.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that not only has Admiral Hichborn stated these things—and I will not quote his exact language, but state here now the general outline of his statements before us, subject to the correction of my friends in opposition. I say Admiral Hichborn, standing at the head of this constructors' corps, has admitted these pertinent facts: First, that the construction of ships in our navy-yards will cost more; second, that the difficulty of obtaining material promptly to meet the demands of this construction are almost insurmountable. Let me explain what that means. Every one of you will realize the force of it, and he himself has stated that it is almost impossible to correct it, and that the present system is the only one that can be adopted by the Government.

A member of a private shipyard firm can go, for instance, to a steel manufacturer when he wants 20 tons or a thousand tons of steel in a hurry and he can buy it in twenty-four hours. The Government can not do that. It would be a dangerous power to place in the hands of any constructor to allow him to go and buy his material without any check upon it. He must make his requisition to the Department. The delay, the time necessary to purchase that material, is, according to the statement of Admiral Hichborn, a very great trouble and a very great objection. And yet we are bound——

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I just want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DAYTON. My friend, I can not yield now. I am right in the middle of my explanation of this question. You can see that I mean no discourtesy to you.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. All right.

Mr. DAYTON. You can not buy your material, you can not take advantage of market rates, as a private firm can. Here is steel or any other material necessary to build these ships that to-day may be bought for such a price, so that you can obtain a large quantity of stores for the future. Under our Government regulations the Government can not do that.

It is the old, old difficulty that stands in the way of the Government becoming a manufacturer—of the Government embarking in something that is not a legitimate purpose and object of government. You may as well say, if you build our ships in Government shipyards, that you may go down to the State of my friend from Kentucky and buy a blue-grass farm and raise the grass necessary for the horses that shall be employed in the shipyards; that you may go to the mountains of West Virginia and purchase coal lands and mine the coal necessary to run the vessels, or go somewhere and buy land to raise the corn and wheat that shall furnish the rations of the sailors.

Constructor Hichborn has further shown in his hearing, has further admitted, first, that the cost will be greater; second, that the difficulty in procuring the material will be almost insurmountable; third, that the repairs necessary to be done upon our vessels are running our shipyards full force and that to-day they are at least a year and more behindhand.

Now, there are two or three other reasons, Mr. Chairman, why this will not do, and I want to refer to the hearing of Constructor Bowles. Constructor Bowles has given an analytical hearing upon this question, and he sets forth nine reasons for and nine reasons against building the ships in the Government yards. I want to call attention to some of those reasons for, and then I want to call attention to what Constructor Bowles himself, who is the strongest and the most earnest advocate of it, says against it. He says:

First. "Maintains efficiency of force and plant."

That is the first reason. Now, I say men have different views about that. My feeling may be a little pessimistic when I say that this Government never undertakes to build anything—a house, a navy-yard, or any branch of work—on its own account without it pays more and has more difficulties with its building than it does when it builds under contract. He says:

Second. "It renders repair work more economic and rapid."

That is entirely answered, I think, when we are behindhand in our repairs, when we have more repairs to do to-day than we can possibly perform in a year. We are building more ships, and these repairs will constantly increase and grow as the years go by. The only argument based on this second ground was that as the work under repairs gets slack the men can be put on the building of a ship; but when repairs are not slack, when every man is kept busy in repair work, then the consequence of placing of ships in our navy-yards to construct would be either one of two things. We would have to increase the capacity of the plant, and increase largely the force of men, or else these ships will remain there unbuilt for years and years, because the repair work must first be accomplished.

The third proposition "will reduce the amount of repair work by removing the necessity for maintenance of force."

I submit that no man can see the force of the reasoning in the constructor's statement on this point. It is so involved as to be groundless.

Fourth. "Maintains a standard of workmanship and design on basis of practical experience."

That is answered to-day by the fact that we have the best workmen of America in the navy-yards for the repair work.

Fifth. "It provides training for the men who must inspect the contractor's work."

I want to say in answer to that, gentlemen, this corps of constructors who are educated by this Government are constantly engaged in inspection work now, and why they should be better educated in the Government yards, where the same work would be going on, than they would be as inspectors in the private yards, where they are now located, is beyond my knowledge. So that argument, it seems to me, is utterly futile.

Sixth. "No profit to be made."

What boots it my friends whether a profit can be made in the private shipyards if they can construct these vessels and make a profit, and yet do it cheaper than he himself confesses it can be done in the navy-yards? Has it come to this, sir, that the forces of this Government are to be aligned against private enterprises of this country, and we are to pay thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars more for the finished products of the Navy in building them ourselves, simply because if we let them to some private individual, some citizen, some American, under a God-given right to get the best he can, will make a profit by doing the work? It seems to me that an answer to that argument is not necessary to be made by anyone.

Seventh. "The indirect charges in commercial practice, which make a large percentage of cost, are not included, because they are already provided and are maintained for other purposes, viz: Interest on plant, taxes, insurance, depreciation and care of property, large proportion of office and organization expense."

I want to say to you gentlemen that that is more than met by the fact that in any calculation had we must take into consideration the fact that in order to maintain this shipbuilding in our navy-yards we are taking away from the Navy these men who are educated by this Government from boyhood up, and that for one purpose—to fight at sea, and not to build institutions on land.

The salaries of these officers are not made to enter into these items, and yet we are paying them year after year, not for the purpose of building up a land navy, but for the purpose of sending these men and officers to sea; and in that connection let me call attention to the fact that we have a scarcity of officers that is simply appalling and which must be met by wise, careful, thorough provision made by this House and by the Senate.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DAYTON. I will.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. In view of the great scarcity of officers which the gentleman alludes to, will the gentleman give the reason for the proposition to transfer the Coast and Geodetic Survey from the civilian management into the Naval Department?

Mr. DAYTON. You will hear about the Coast and Geodetic Survey in due time, and you will hear from the unanimous committee upon that, and in a way, I think, that will entirely enlighten the House; and I am sure it will enlighten the gentleman from Massachusetts, knowing his well-known reputation for fairness. The gentleman will pardon me for not taking up that branch of the question until I reach it.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Does the gentleman intend to intimate that the lack of officers is due to the fact that the constructors are kept from sea duty by work at the yards?

Mr. DAYTON. Not all of them. Every yard has its constructor, and the reason why they do not have more constructors is because the number is limited.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Does the gentleman know that it was stated before the committee that there are more constructors inspecting work in private yards than are engaged in the Government yards?

Mr. DAYTON. I know the statement was made, but it is not borne out by the record.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from West Virginia yield?

Mr. DAYTON. I can not yield any further.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I want to make a correction of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. DAYTON. If I have made a misstatement, the House will hear from it, because there are some very able members on the minority who will follow me. If I have made a misstatement, it has not been purposely made.

Now they say the cost of inspection is saved. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand how that argument could come from anybody but a naval officer. The cost of inspection will be saved, and yet that is one of the very strong arguments in favor of private yards. Why? I say to you and to this House, and it seems to me it will appeal to the reason and common sense, that one of the great advantages of building a ship at a private yard is the fact that the private yard has its engineer, and the Government has its engineer, or inspector, or constructor.

The two stand side by side together, they interchange ideas, they modify each other's plans, they attend to the minutest detail in the construction of the ship, and I want to say to you that some of the very best improvements that have been made upon the plans of ships that have been built have not come from those who originally worked out the plans in the Department, they have not come alone from the Government constructors, but have come from the interchange of these ideas and suggestions made necessary by these combinations of the company's private engineer and the Government's constructor. We get a better product in consequence of it.

Lastly, he says "the cost of the trial trip is saved." Well, I do not deem it necessary to refer to as trivial a reason as that. Now, let us see what the constructor himself contends, a partisan for building ships in American yards. Let us see what he admits——

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I would like to have the gentleman state what authority he has to say that the constructor of the United States Navy is any more a partisan in the construction of ships, for he is a Government official and supposed to be moved by patriotic motives, than the gentleman is himself who advocates the construction of ships in private yards.

Mr. DAYTON. It comes from the advocacy of it for years. The reputation of Constructor Bowles, who stands at the height of his profession, and who has a reputation that he may well be proud of, has always been in favor of this proposition, and he has been the leading advocate of it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. But why call him a partisan?

Mr. DAYTON. I used the word not in its offensive sense, not in its political sense, but in the sense of champion, which I will substitute for it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. That is better.

Mr. DAYTON. Now, he admits the cumbersome system of design and management of independent bureaus. I do not care to enter into a discussion, but there he stands in opposition to such men as Admiral O'Neil, Admiral Melville, and Admiral Endicott, men whose judgment certainly is entitled to as much weight as his, as to the advantage of having independent bureaus, and having different men engaged in different specific work, interchanging ideas and meeting together in a board and discussing all these propositions, instead of having one man encumbered with all these scientific and abstruse matters. Then he says wages are 30 per cent and 40 per cent higher.

Third. Boy and unskilled labor is not used to advantage on account of artificial restrictions of labor board.

In setting forth this consideration he points out the fact that private shipyards are enabled to give employment, and suitable, proper employment, to a large number of boys that the Government under our system can not employ; and that shipyards, run by their own methods, are able to employ a large number of unskilled laborers that we are not permitted to employ under our law and regulations for the employment of men in the service.

Then he speaks of the eight hours' work a day in Government yards against ten in private establishments.

Fifth. Seven holidays with full pay.
Sixth. Purchase of material by the Navy system involves delay and extra cost.
Seventh. Outside plants are better arranged, and no restrictions are placed on the utilization of space to the best advantage.
Eighth. Per diem compensation is used where piecework is economical.
Ninth. No guaranty of performance under contract conditions.

Now, I want to refer to this last point—"no guaranty of performance under contract conditions." Suppose you build a battle ship in an American navy-yard—a Government yard. You may spend $6,000,000 upon it; you may armor it; you may start it out upon the sea, and it may turn over and go to the bottom, in which case every dollar of your six millions is gone.

On the other hand, when you build your ship by private contract, the Government has the bond of the contractor that the ship, in speed and material, in all that makes the finished product, shall come up to the conditions of the contract. And then it must go to sea and be put upon trial. As the poet Kipling has said, "The bolts and bars must wrench themselves together;" they must fit themselves together until they sing the sweet music of a battle ship fully equipped, entire and complete, prepared to carry the American flag to the four quarters of the world. If the ship upon its trial should turn over—if there should appear any defect or fault in the construction—the Government loses not a dollar, not a cent. The Government has its bond, its contract, and the loss is upon the contractor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have pointed out that the majority of this committee has been actuated in opposing this measure by the considerations—first, that it is more costly; second, that it will take a longer time to build a ship under this proposed system; third, we shall not get as good a ship, and lastly, we shall not have any guaranty against loss in case the ship should turn out to be not a perfect vessel.

It seems to me—and I say it with all deference and all kindness to gentlemen on the other side—that these reasons are very much like those of the lawyer who came into court and said that he had thirteen reasons why his client did not appear that morning to answer the charge against him. Said he, "The first is that my client is dead." At that point the court interrupted him and said, "You need not state the other twelve reasons." It seems to me that any one of the reasons I have cited is sufficient for us in deciding against this proposition upon its merits, and not actuated by any selfish motive or purpose to build up any yard in any district.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to talk for a little while about the other proposition that has caused so much discussion and so much question upon the floor of this House—a question that has become, I fear, somewhat wearisome, because we have read and studied it so much, and had it so often before us. That is the question of what we shall pay for armor plate. In the first place, I want to call the attention of the House to what armor is—what the term means. We sometimes lose our bearings in the discussion of these questions by not comprehending the simpler propositions involved.

It is said that the diamond is the hardest substance in the world and that it consists simply of pure carbon crystallized. Armor plate is nothing in the world except an effort to diamondize or carbonize steel. Armor plate is rendered so hard that no other substance can cut it, no other substance can act upon it. In the manufacture of armor there are a vast number of matters of detail that we can hardly comprehend. You may take a watch spring—the old, familiar illustration of the watch spring—the material of the manufacture means but a trifling per cent of its value; and when we compare the price with the value of the material we wonder where the cost is.

No man can fully comprehend the armor-plate business until he goes to one of these factories and studies the process stage by stage, step by step, and sees the reason why it is so costly—sees the danger of loss in various directions and in different forms that springs up on all sides, and takes into consideration in connection with that the vast capital involved in the manufacture of the finished plate.

Now, I want to call attention to the fact that no man can tell what the exact cost of a particular armor plate may be. One may cost one sum; another may cost another sum. One may come out a finished product; the other may not—it may be defective. Hundreds of plates may be defective in a given run; one only may be perfect. All of these things are to be taken into consideration in the determination of the question of cost.

Another thing is the fact that because of the many improvements, modifications, and changes that have been made in the making up of armor plate it is impracticable to utilize the old machinery that answered the purpose two or three years ago, except to a very limited extent. These things have made changes in that machinery entirely necessary. As an illustration, I might cite that I know of one armor-plate factory in which stands a machine that cost a round million of dollars, which is absolutely worthless now except for the bare raw material contained in it.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. DAYTON. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me here. He has interrupted us all on these propositions. I think it wholly desirable that the House should have an opportunity of hearing the discussion and being informed as far as practicable upon these questions. Of course I do not mean any discourtesy in refusing, but I think the House ought to have the information which has come into the possession of the members of the committee.

Another thing, Mr. Chairman. This question is based simply upon this foundation, and can only be based upon it: First, whether this Government can manufacture its own armor plate cheaper than it can purchase it from private contractors; and the same propositions and the same elements enter into this to a certain extent that entered into the question of building ships in our own shipyards. It is not merely necessary to build the armor-plate factory for the purpose of manufacturing the armor, but there are other important elements which gentlemen seem to overlook.

The connection between the factory and the steel mills and works is just as close and just as important as anything can possibly be in any branch of manufacture. We must have, somewhere, a point where we can obtain the ore—the ingot, the raw material—in its cheaper stages. We talk of the gun factory here at Washington with so much pride. I doubt, sir, if there is a member of this House who comprehends the fact that that factory could not run a day or an hour even unless the material were prepared and furnished by one of our steel works in an unfinished condition and that the gun factory simply takes it and finishes it, rounding it out, to the completed gun ready for service.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The preliminary work being done by private individuals.

Mr. DAYTON. Yes; by private enterprise. Private enterprise furnishes one-half, and we do only the finishing of the work.

To build an armor-plate factory, therefore, without having the necessary steel mills to supply the raw material would be to build simply the top and leave the bottom incomplete. It would be simply an establishment without the steel works or the mills to take the crude product and put it into shape for the armor-plate factory to work upon; and does any gentleman suppose, without these mills or works, that we could undertake to manufacture plates at any price at which they may be bought in the markets of the world to-day?

I take one of the great armor-plate factories: The steel mills they have in connection with the other processes which are necessary to the manufacture of the armor plate extend miles and cover acres. I am informed that they own the ore in the mountain side, the railroad that carries the ore to the steel works; they own the blast furnaces, or smelting works, that separate the iron and the clay, and then they own the rolling mills that prepare it, the molds in which it is molded, and carry the whole process through this miles of works until it comes out the finished product of armor plate, ready for the battle ships; and yet we are told that the Government is to undertake all of this; that it should own the mills, the railroads that transport it, the steel works, the smelting works, the rolling mills, and all of that, in order to enable the Government to manufacture a few tons of armor plate.

Now, these armor-plate factories went into this business at the suggestion of the Government. Once they declined, but at the continued requests of the Government they undertook it, and yet from that day to this they have been assailed in character in every statement they have made and have been abused and vilified simply because they say they are not making unfair or undue profit on the manufacture of armor plate, but because it costs what it does, and because it costs largely in excess of what uneducated members of Congress seem to think it ought to cost—and I speak without any reflection upon the House or upon any member of the House, for we can not go into all of the questions of technical detail involving this manufacture. I say because it costs more than Congress seems to think it should cost, these people are accused of making an inordinate and unreasonable profit.

And yet, as was pointed out by the gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday evening, they offer to sell the plate factories to this Government for the mere cost—the absolute cost. And the proposition for the sale was further coupled with an offer to place it—that is, to build the factory—at such point as the Government might determine; in other words, to set it up anywhere that the Government might desire.

I have heard this statement made over and over again, that the Government should build its own armor-plate factory, even if they do not manufacture a ton of armor, "in order to punish" these people!

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman a question there?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes; if the gentleman will please not consume any more of my time than possible.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from West Virginia please tell the House if either of the armor-plate factories has ever furnished to the Government any admittedly reasonable data to establish the large cost which they claim for a ton of armor plate; and if such information has been furnished, where may it be found?

Mr. DAYTON. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I never went to a tailor in my life to buy a suit of clothes but what I asked him his price. But I never undertook to call upon him to give me explicit data as to the cost of the various items entering into that suit of clothes. I did not ask him to tell me what the thread would cost, what the buttons would cost, what the coat tails would cost, what the tailoring would cost, or all of the other items entering into the make-up of the suit. [Applause and laughter.]

And I hope the time will never come when American statesmen dealing with these questions from the standpoint of honest, honorable men, and dealing with honorable men, will expect any manufacturer or any dealer in any article to get down into these little details simply to gratify what seems to me an impertinent curiosity.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. May I ask my colleague one other question?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes; you may.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The gentleman seems to accentuate the fact that these men are of incorruptible integrity. Will he state to the House that they have been convicted of fraud practiced upon the Federal Government, the same men who are now expected to engage in the manufacture of this armor plate for the Government?

Mr. DAYTON. I have not time to enter into a discussion of that. It is a matter of record and has been thrashed over and over again. It is very well known, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] stated on yesterday, that there were at one time defective armor plates passed upon this Government. It is very well understood also that subsequent to that time—whether the armor manufacturers themselves knew it or not is a question, and there is a difference of opinion about that—subsequent to that time those plates were rejected. The fault of their ever being passed upon this Government was upon the Government's own inspector there, who passed them, and I say it is not necessary for me to enter into that discussion in face of the fact that the owners of the armor-plate factories disclaim any knowledge in reference to it, and supposed that these plates would pass when they did pass the Government inspector.

Mr. DALZELL. Will my friend allow me a suggestion just there?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly I will.

Mr. DALZELL. That the fault found with the contractors was not that they furnished plates that were deficient under the lowest term of the contract, but they were fined for furnishing plates that were 5 per cent better than the minimum requirement of the contract.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. But the plates were full of blowholes.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no; not full of blowholes——

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. And this man Schwab who is now president of the Carnegie Company was general manager of it at that time.

Mr. DALZELL. Later on I will show the gentleman the record on that subject.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I have the record.

Mr. DAYTON. And the Secretary of the Navy said they did not do any harm, and there was a difference of opinion whether they constituted defects or not.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. He fined them $300,000 for it, all the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may finish his remarks.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. It comes out of the time on the other side, of course. I should be glad to have the gentleman's time extended, but I suppose it will come out of the time on that side.

Mr. DAYTON. There is no fixed limit of time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAYTON. Now, I want to say here that it has been ascertained since that time in the manufacture of the Krupp armor that these "blowholes" that are spoken of are no disadvantage, and I might as well state that the Krupp armor is full of them in effect.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. VANDIVER. In view of the statement that the gentleman has just made, I should like to have him turn to the report of the committee that investigated that matter and show this House on what ground he bases his statement that the fault lay in the Government inspector, and, secondly, the other statement that the plates were not defective, but were better than contracted for, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DAYTON. I want to say to my colleague that that would necessarily involve my stopping in my remarks here and going to look over that report. He understands that it is not indexed, but if he will read it I am sure that he will find the fact as I state. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to go on. Here is the proposition in its bald nakedness. We stand here Congress after Congress raising this same hue and cry against the armor-plate manufacturers in the teeth of the facts, first, that they have offered to sell out to us their armor-plate factories, set them up, and furnish the men to run them for the bare cost that it has been to them; second, that we have had the expert Admiral O'Neil at the head of this Bureau for one solid year collecting information in regard to this, and he has come in with his report and stated to us substantially that we can not manufacture armor plate any cheaper than, if as cheap as, we buy it, if we take an armor-plate factory and build it. And if you will make the calculation yourselves and take all that is involved in it, the risk, the expense, the capital involved, the doubt of obtaining material, the control of the secret, and all the other elements that enter into it, I want to say to you that in my judgment, if you will fairly and dispassionately give one month's time to the study of the question, you will reach the conclusion that every ton of armor plate that this Government will manufacture will cost not less than $800 and possibly a thousand dollars. Mark you, that is my view about it, and I am honest and candid in it, although I may be mistaken.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The price is going up all the time, is it not?

Mr. DAYTON. Prices are going up and material is going up. It requires a constant corps of skilled workmen. Prices are changing, and new machinery is required, and all those things enter into this proposition.

And, Mr. Chairman, I call your attention further to the fact that we get this armor plate offered to us to-day at a less price than that at which any other government of the world can buy it. Take my illustration of a coat. Why should I, when I go to my tailor and he shows me the material and says, "I will make you this suit of clothes for so much money," go around to every other tailor in the country and find every one of them charge more money for it, then say that, because I have that sentiment in my heart that leads me to believe nevertheless that the tailor is cheating me in my coat, I will therefore turn tailor and manufacture my own coats, go into business myself rather than pay him a price that is the cheapest price that I can obtain the same material and the same coat for in the whole community?

Mr. KITCHIN. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman has said that in his opinion, if the Government makes the armor plate we need, which we know will be 5,000 to 6,000 tons a year for several years, that it will cost the Government $800 a ton to make it. Now, I would really like to know upon what fact the gentleman bases that opinion? Certainly not upon Secretary Herbert's report or on Admiral O'Neil's testimony. I would like to know where the gentleman gets his information?

Mr. DAYTON. I would like to enter into that, but can not now, because it would take me more time than I have at command. But if the gentleman will study this question in all of its bearings, with the experience we have of the cost of the material, the danger and difficulties that are involved in the process, remembering that this steel goes through at least fourteen different processes, and some say twenty-one, before it comes out the finished product; if he will consider all these facts, and remember the changes that are constantly coming, estimate the risk, the insurance, the working capital, and all those items, and study it out as I have studied it out, or attempted to study it out, and at the same time recognize that no figures can be depended upon, because you can not foretell the future risks in a matter of this kind, he will, I think, reach my conclusion. I made the statement in absolute sincerity, but upon my judgment simply; but it is my judgment, after five years' study of this question as earnestly and as thoroughly as I was capable of studying any question, that every ton of armor plate manufactured by this Government would cost $800 or $1,000 a ton.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAYTON. I want to call attention first to one more thing.

Mr. DRIGGS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DRIGGS. The gentleman is talking by consent of the House, and he ought to yield to a question.

Mr. DAYTON. I will.

Mr. DRIGGS. I would like to ask you a question about the construction of ships by the Government in the navy-yards. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question when he was speaking in his hour, but he declined to yield, and I did not care to interrupt him then; but now he is talking with the consent of the House, and I would like to ask him a question about that.

Mr. HOPKINS. He is talking about another question, entirely foreign to your question.

Mr. DRIGGS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAYTON. I do not want to leave this question, but when I get through I will yield to a question on that subject.

Mr. DRIGGS. I wanted to get in a question on that subject, but as the gentleman says he is unwilling to yield, I do not desire to interrupt him at this time.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to call attention to another thing relating to this matter. What use is there for the armor; how long will the demand for armor continue; how much of it may we make? Why, Mr. Chairman, the question involved is a clear-cut business proposition. How much armor are you going to require; how long are you going to require armor; how long will the machinery of your plant be capable of manufacturing the best armor? Because, I thank God, the sentiment is abroad throughout this land that the American sailor—the best man, the best seamen, best fighter in the world's history—is entitled to the best protection, and if the world goes on and improves its armor we will improve the protection of the American sailor behind the guns, or else we will not be true to Americanism. [Applause.]

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman yield to me right on that point?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes.

Mr. SNODGRASS. You stated a while ago that there was a secret process that entered into the best armor. If that is well founded, it is an important thing for us to consider, because if we should build a factory and not be in possession of the secret process we could do nothing toward making the best armor. I would like to have the gentleman state the evidence before the committee upon that point.

Mr. DAYTON. In the first place I want to say that when the Harvey armor was discovered a few years ago one of the manufacturing firms of this country, and I am not sure but two, paid $500,000 for the process. In the last two years Mr. Krupp, of the great Krupp Works in Germany, discovered a new process, and the best we can understand about it is that it is a change from the charcoal to gas treatment. As I said, armor is simply an effort to carbonize or diamondize steel. Diamonds and charcoal stand as representatives of carbon, and the harveyized process was a charcoal process. The Krupp process, as best we can understand it, is a gaseous process. Now, we know that fact, and that is as far as the secret is known.

These people pay a royalty of $45 a ton for the purpose of using this new process, and it makes a product 25 per cent better. In other words, it takes 25 per cent less of Krupp armor than it does of the harveyized armor. The advantage of that you can see at once. We have been paying $400 a ton for the Harvey armor, and the purpose is to pay $545 for the Krupp armor. The $45 a ton is the royalty. One hundred dollars is for the better armor. It will take 25 per cent less of the Krupp armor if you cover the same surface; in other words, 25 per cent of the weight of the armor disappears and you make up in speed, you make up in better quality of the armor, the capacity to resist penetration is better, your coal bunkers can be increased, you can run your ship better, and, all told, these advantages at least make it 40 or 50 per cent better for the ship than with the harveyized armor. Now, they demand $100 for that; they say, and they have reiterated it over and over again, that they would much prefer to furnish the Harveyized armor at $400 per ton than the Krupp armor at $545 a ton.

Now, Admiral O'Neil has stated that we know substantially, but not completely, the secret of the Krupp manufacture. The private manufacturers in this country have the honor, at least, not to undertake to manufacture the Krupp armor without paying a royalty. The proposition here to build a Government plant, to manufacture the Krupp armor, involves one of two things: Whether this Government would undertake to manufacture it without paying the royalty; and, second, whether or not we really do know the secret. We know it generally, but not in its details. Then the question is coming, whether this Government, if it should refuse to pay the royalty that private firms pay without hesitation, would not find itself entering a field in that position condemned to such an extent that the steel companies and everybody else would refuse to do business with us.

Mr. TERRY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DAYTON. I can not yield any further. I have been diverted from my argument, and I am taking up too much time. But, Mr. Chairman, what are the questions to be solved? Even if we could manufacture armor at the same price as the other, why should we? If we could do it at a little less, why should we? What is the demand for armor plate? We have under construction and have already constructed 16 battle ships. We could not possibly build this plant and get it in operation for these vessels that we have authorized.

I know it is said that we can get it in operation in three years; but every man who has had anything to do with the business of this country, and who knows how slow these Government works progress, will bear me out, and an examination of the record will bear me out, in saying that every Department of this Government, especially with all yards, docks, and with all ordnance, have years of work before them. This bill carries years of contracts in it. I say every one of us would realize that a safe estimate would be that the armor-plate factory would not come into actual operation, so as to turn out armor, inside of five years. It is stated that it can be done in three years, but when we remember that these contracts are always delayed, that is a safe and reasonable estimate. So that we have got to delay the building up of our American Navy for five years or else we have got to go on and contract for this armor.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the battle ships are the ones we speak of. How many battle ships will this Government build? How large a demand for the future will there be for this plant? How long will there be a demand for this product? England has her 70 battle ships. Will we need more 30?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will my friend from West Virginia yield to me for a question just there?

Mr. DAYTON. I will.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The American demand for armor plate does not necessarily establish the price that is asked for it throughout the world, I believe?

Mr. DAYTON. No, sir.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Because the foreign demand, the purchases of other countries, is an element that enters largely into the price.

Mr. DAYTON. Ah, but America is the supreme and potent influence in this matter of armor plate, as it is in most other manufactures. The American people—the American manufacturer—inspired as he is by the unlimited power of American ingenuity and American mechanical genius, is branching out in all directions, building armor plate now for most of the nations of the earth. We are building armor plate to-day for the Russian Government, a government that built a plate factory for itself recently, but finds it better and cheaper to use the plate manufactured by our private enterprise in America than to run its own factory.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I desire to illustrate the point I wished to make in that connection. If we withheld or limited the operation of any bill authorizing the construction of any vessel, it does not necessarily follow that we get the armor plate necessary for that vessel at a cheaper rate.

Mr. DAYTON. Not at all.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. For it may appreciate in price while we are waiting.

Mr. DAYTON. That is true.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And is it not true also that if we had let the contract long ago, when the first construction of these ships was authorized by law, we would have been able to get the armor plate at a less price than we do to-day?

Mr. DAYTON. That may be true; but there is a limit in this regard as well as an element that the gentleman should not overlook. We would have not gotten the same kind of armor plate that we get to-day. We do not want to buy or prepare for the permanent manufacture of any kind of armor plate, because the armor plate is changing and improving from year to year. We do not use the same kind now that was in use two years ago.

It has been said recently that a new process has been discovered and will soon be made known in Germany to take the place of Krupp armor; and more recently accounts have come to us of a man who proposes to dispense altogether with armor and use compressed cotton. We find, therefore, this element of uncertainty, and we do not know what to-morrow may bring forth or what the demands upon us will be. We only know, standing here, that we will have the cheapest armor which is attainable, of the best quality, and we will have the best protection for the best sailors in the world. At the outside, the demand for this plate armor will necessarily be limited.

It will impress itself upon the mind of every gentleman here to-day that our Navy before long will be rounded out; that we will have a safe number of these stronger and better ships, known as the battle ships, the fighting ships. We are not in the manufacture of ships simply for the purpose of building them. We want serviceable vessels, if we build any. America, with her free institution, does not need, surrounded by the seas on all sides and sustained and maintained by educated, patriotic people, what is required by other nations. We need a navy commensurate with our needs of defense. Now, defense is very frequently misunderstood.

I can defend myself from an attack of another by running away. I can defend myself by simply warding off his blows; or, to use an illustration of Captain Mahan's, if a snake comes into my room at night, I can defend myself by putting it out of the room or by crushing its head. But proper defense of a country like ours means that when a nation undertakes to attack us we will be ready to protect ourselves and defend our people at all points.

A man may come and strike me because he has a feeling of anger against me, but he is not so likely to come if he knows that blow will meet blow, stroke will meet stroke, and that he will have a broken nose for my black eye. That is the true meaning of defense, and that is its true purpose and object—the building up of this Navy of ours, not alone to keep from coming to our shores those who may have some enmity against us and desire to take revenge upon us and then go away unharmed and unscathed, but we want to proclaim that every bit of land over which floats the American flag is defended by a navy that will strike back blow for blow, a navy calculated to create that wholesome fear which will prevent attack.

But at the same time, Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for us to defend ourselves as England defends herself. England is surrounded by narrow channels from other nations that may combine and confederate against her at any hour. It is not necessary for us to have such a navy as she has. If England should get into a war with America to-day, one-half of her 70 battle ships would be absolutely necessary to protect her own coasts and would not be able to cross the seas to engage any force of ours.

The same is true with regard to Germany and France. Over there on the Continent of Europe, those different countries forming a sort of checkerboard, combinations and alliances may be made to-day and broken to-morrow. We, surrounded by the Atlantic on the one side and the Pacific on the other, God's favored land, will not need such a navy as do those other nations. What we do need is a navy commensurate with our necessities—a navy sufficient, as I have said, to inspire fear, to prevent attack, and to enable us to work out the great destiny that God Almighty intended us to work out.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in my investigation of this matter—and I simply give these views for what they are worth, as my private opinion—the time will come and is fast coming when we shall reach the limits of the number of battle ships that we shall need. I do not believe that limit will exceed thirty or thirty-five or forty. Then what shall we do with our armor-plate factory, if we have one? You may retort by asking what the private manufacturer will do.

I say to you the private manufacturer will go out and build armor for Russia and France and Germany; for Japan, for China, and for the other nations of the world. But this Government can never go into the manufacture of armor for other nations, no matter upon what peaceful relations we may be with those nations. No nation can go to the factory of another independent government. No nation will come to our Government establishment to have armor plate manufactured for her ships that may some time meet ours in direful conflict.

This is the situation in regard to this subject; and I insist, Mr. Chairman, that it is time for us to settle this question and settle it finally. From all the investigations, covering a period of five years, I believe there can not be a worse mistake made by Congress than to embark in the manufacture of armor plate.

And now I yield, as I promised, to my friend from New York [Mr. DRIGGS].

Mr. DRIGGS. I thank the gentleman from West Virginia for his courtesy, and I apologize to him for interrupting him at the stage of his argument when he was talking on a different subject from that to which my questions apply. But I have waited an hour or an hour and a half for this opportunity to interrogate him.

The gentleman said in the commencement of his argument that Secretary Long had stated that it would cost twice as much and would take twice as long to build Government ships in our navy-yards as by private contracts. Now, is it not the fact that at the time comparisons were made on this subject it did not take twice as long to build the Maine, the Texas, the Cincinnati, and the Raleigh as it would have taken to build them in private yards, and it did not cost twice as much, according to official statements?

That is my first question. I do not desire to reflect on the Secretary of the Navy at all, because I do not think he was thoroughly posted on the question according to the evidence as given before the committee.

Mr. DAYTON. I have simply this to say: That it is very difficult to make comparisons in this matter. Ships are of different kinds, of different characters and varieties. It takes longer to build one ship than another. It is very difficult to draw a correct comparison between a ship built in a Government navy-yard and one built at a private yard.

That is one trouble about these things. You can not get any cut-and-dried rule in regard to these matters whereby you can reduce them to an actual comparison. I read the statement of the Secretary, and he is sincere in it, because, taking all things into consideration, our experience generally has been along that line.

Take, for instance, the old Texas, built in the Norfolk Navy-Yard. Why, if the gentleman will review the arguments and the proceedings in Congress here, he will be amused to find that the Texas was so long in building that actually she was almost forgotten, and they raised a point of order, I think, upon an appropriation for continuing the work.

Mr. DRIGGS. Well, we find by the record that the keel of the Texas was laid——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAYTON. I do not want to yield further than to answer the questions which were asked me.

Mr. DRIGGS. The gentleman agreed to yield for two questions, but all I desire to do is to ask the second question, and that is, Do not England, France, Russia, Germany, Italy, Norway, and Sweden build some of their own war ships in their own government dockyards?

Mr. DAYTON. That is under entirely different conditions, and the hours of labor, wages, and all those things enter into that question. It is impossible, I say, for us to enter into any comparison with those countries in regard to that. And then the consensus of opinion upon conditions existing here agrees, as I stated before, that it will cost more and take a longer time; and the danger is that we will not have as fine a finished product, and will never have any guaranty for the completion of it and of its perfectness.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. THROPP. If the gentleman will allow me, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS] corrects your statement by saying that Secretary Long said it would take twice as long. If it is not twice as long, how much longer were they in building in a Government yard than in a private yard?

Mr. DRIGGS. I will answer that, if you want me to.

Mr. DAYTON. I will say to the gentleman, as I said before, you can not tell, because you can not compare vessels of different type.

Mr. THROPP. I wanted to know whether——

Mr. GAINES. Will my friend permit a question?

Mr. DAYTON. I want to yield the floor, if I can. I will answer just one question.

Mr. GAINES. Did not Secretary Long recommend, and did not the Congress, of which you were a member, pass an appropriation to build a smokeless-powder factory, and was not that smokeless-powder factory built, and is it not now in operation and furnishing us with smokeless powder? And if that is so, why was that done?

Mr. DAYTON. Under the exigencies of the war we undertook the building of a smokeless-powder factory.

Mr. GAINES. That was before the war.

Mr. DAYTON. I can say to the gentleman that I have always been unalterably opposed to Government manufactures, and am to-day.

Mr. GAINES. And you voted for that?

Mr. DAYTON. And because we made mistakes once is no reason why we should be continually making mistakes and be building up the Navy on shore instead of building it on sea.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one thing more, and I am done, and I shall devote but a very few moments to it. The cry has been made here that we are extravagant in this bill. With all due respect to the gentlemen who make this charge, I want to say that it is not carried out by the facts. Objection has been made to the fact that we provide for an emergency fund of $500,000 to be put at the disposition of the President, to be used by him if it becomes necessary, in the conduct of the Navy in connection with our new possessions in the Philippines and Porto Rico and in the establishment of the government that we promised to Cuba.

I have but one thing to say to this, Mr. Chairman. When it became necessary for us to embark upon that war there was no hesitation in the patriotism of this House of Representatives on either side to place at the disposal of the President of the United States $50,000,000 to carry it on. Why should there come to-day an objection to placing $500,000 at his disposal to establish peace and order in those islands after that war has passed and gone?

That is what this emergency fund is for. We do not know the conditions that may arise in those far-off seas. We do not know what may be required in order to maintain our Navy there. Knowledge has not come to us. We therefore can not appropriate any specific item for the things that will be necessary to be done there. The sum is small. Five hundred thousand dollars is asked for the purpose of establishing the American flag, American civilization, American freedom and liberty, and good form of government in those islands, so far as the Navy may be called upon to contribute to it.

It was fifty millions for war; it is $500,000 to establish peace. We voted fifty millions without a word. Why should there be objection to voting $500,000 to establish law and order? I can see no objection to it.

I certainly ask the pardon of the House for consuming so much time. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, some years ago Victor Hugo estimated that the civilized nations of the world spent 900,000 francs every twenty-four hours, four hundred millions every year, saluting one another, saluting the rising sun and the setting sun, and interchanging international courtesies by the explosion of powder; in short, $60,000,000 every year blown up in smoke, while a million people die for lack of bread. Do not imagine by this introduction that I am intending to affront the champions of war by making an appeal for economy.

I shall not at this time undertake to make any such appeal or any such argument. I have heard the argument for economy so often made upon this floor and with so little effect that I shall not undertake to renew it now. But I am constrained to make one or two brief observations before taking up the special provisions of this bill on the expense of war. I suppose it would be a mockery at this time to refer to the fact that two years ago the world held a peace conference. The so called civilized nations of the world got together and exchanged friendly salutations, compliments to each other, and the peace conference at the Hague was given out to be the inauguration of a new programme of the world—a programme of peace and good will among men.

I say the so-called civilized nations, the nations professing to be Christian; and from that day to this, America and England, the professedly Christian people of the world, have been the only ones to violate the principle of international arbitration, and have given to the world the saddest lesson of war that has come during the last hundred years. So that I have been forced to the conclusion that what is called "Christian civilization," when put in the scale and weighed against the interest of commercialism, the interest of trade and traffic, has but little influence in controlling the affairs of this world.

I have been forced to the conclusion that "Christian civilization" is but a cloak of hypocrisy which hides the devil's own purposes; and if there is any such influence felt anywhere in the world as that which we denominate "Christian civilization" I want to know, in behalf of justice and humanity, where it finds refuge since the days of the massacre of the Armenians by the Turks, the murder of the South African patriots by the British, and the slaughter of helpless Filipinos by the Americans.

Do not imagine, sir, that I am now entering upon an argument on the question of expansion or any other question than the bill before the House. I would, if opportunity were offered, enter into that discussion; but not now. I only offer these reflections as an introduction to what I propose to say on the bill for the purpose of calling the attention of the House, and so far as possible the attention of the country, to this important question, the cost of war, the folly and the horror of war.

I have no time to enter into any details; but, in brief, let me say this: Up to the beginning of the present century such a thing as a great national debt extending from year to year, from one generation to another, was not heard of; but during all the warlike ages of the world the methods by which monarchs obtained money for carrying on war were, first, forced loans from wealthy citizens; secondly, heavy taxation; and, thirdly, voluntary loans, to be repaid in short time; but when the modern method of financiering great enterprises came into vogue and the lesson of financiering had been taught by the great corporations of the world, issuing long-time bonds, government financiers soon discovered an easy method of raising all the money necessary for waging war, and so the practical difficulties of financiering a great war were obviated.

Since that time great national debts have been piled up. At the close of the Napoleonic wars it was estimated that the government debts of the world amounted, in round numbers, to $7,750,000,000, the largest that had ever been known up to that time. But in 1848 the immense public debt of the world, growing out of war, had climbed to $8,650,000,000; in 1862 the enormous aggregate of $13,750,000,000 measured the world's war debt; in 1872 $23,025,000,000 were required to measure the burdens which war had imposed upon civilized society; and in 1882 it had risen to the stupendous aggregate of $26,970,000,000; in 1892, to $29,000,000,000, and at the present time the stupendous and appalling aggregate of $32,000,000,000 will scarcely measure the world's indebtedness to the Moloch of battles.

The first cause of all this burden is perhaps the savage spirit still potent among the most civilized people, which enables ambitious monarchs to marshal great armies for conquest. For it is a sad reflection on the history of mankind that for the greater part—in fact, almost the whole—of this immense war debt has been incurred in prosecution of wars of conquest and not in the cause of liberty. But the second cause is perhaps still more shameful to the pride of civilized man, if he has any pride. It is the cupidity of great wealth, which considers Government bonds better than private enterprise, and hence a national debt as a national blessing—that is, to the bondholder.

Thernardier on the field of Waterloo, picking silver coins and gold watches from the pockets of dead heroes, is not more ghoulish than old moneybags urging more bonds, that he may clip more coupons.

It was estimated some years ago by a distinguished gentleman—Prof. H. C. Adams, of Cornell University—that to pay the interest alone on this immense indebtedness of the world would require 3,000,000 men working constantly at $1.50 per day.

So great has become the indebtedness of the world that the continuous labor of 3,000,000 of men must be employed merely to pay the interest. But within the last half century scarcely any government on earth has maintained its interest and its running expenses, but on an average the deficit in the world's account for the last half century has annually amounted to more than $500,000,000.

The ravages of war I shall not undertake to describe. I only mention these facts to bring to the attention of this House the enormous expenditures of civilized nations for war and preparation for war. If I had the time, I should like to quote the words of the distinguished Speaker of this House, eloquently portraying the ravages of war. I shall insert them in the RECORD. I should like to quote the keen sarcasm of old Thomas Carlyle in ridiculing the causes for war. I should like to quote the eloquent words of that distinguished old Frenchman, Victor Hugo, in denouncing the horrors of war; but these, and all of these, I must pass by. I only give a sample here taken from Sartor Resartus:

> What, speaking in quite unofficial language, is the net purport and upshot of war? To my own knowledge, for example, there dwell and toil in the British village of Dumdridge usually some 500 souls. From these, by certain "natural enemies" of the French, there are successively selected, during the French war, say, 30 able-bodied men.
> Dumdridge, at her own expense, has suckled and nursed them: she has, not without difficulty and sorrow, fed them up to manhood, and even trained them to crafts, so that one can weave, another build, another hammer, and the weakest can stand under 30 stone avoirdupois. Nevertheless, amid much weeping and swearing, they are selected, all dressed in red, and shipped away, at the public charge, some 2,000 miles, or say only to the south of Spain, and fed there till wanted.
> And now to that same spot in the south of Spain are 30 similar French artisans, from a French Dumdridge, in like manner wending, till at length, after infinite effort, the two parties come into actual juxtaposition; and Thirty stands fronting Thirty, each with a gun in his hand.
> Straightway the word "fire" is given and blow out the souls of one another; and in place of 60 brisk, useful craftsmen the world has 60 dead carcases, which it must bury, and anon shed tears for. Had these men any quarrel? Busy as the devil is, not the smallest. They live far enough apart; were the entirest strangers; nay, in so wide a universe there was even, unconsciously, by commerce, some mutual helpfulness between them. How then? Simpleton! Their governors had fallen out; and instead of shooting one another, had cunning to make those poor blockheads shoot.

GENERAL HENDERSON ON WAR—THE NEXT SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE THAT WILL PASS ON WAR BUDGETS AND WAR POLICIES ABHORS WAR.

"Gen. D. B. HENDERSON, of Iowa, will to-morrow (Monday)," says the New York World of Sunday, "be elected Speaker of the House of Representatives."

Following is the speech made by him at a soldiers' gathering in Chicago September 12, 1893:

* * * * * * * *

"Mr. President, my theme to-day is war, and I am against it. I wish I had all the gifts to speak my abhorrence of war.

* * * * * * * *

"It takes courage, I grant, to face death. The sufferings and the trials of the soldier have not been exaggerated. But the courage needed to face danger and death ranks far below the courage that faces the superstitions, prejudices, the wealth, and the established customs of the world.

"The great man reasons; the small man fights.

"Grant's words of peace will survive his mightest war cry.

"The cost of war alone should make us stop and think.

"The public debts of the world are twenty-nine billions, and it safe to say that every dollar of this is the fruit of war. What a strain upon earth, shops, and fields!

"In one hundred years Great Britain has paid $4,702,306,010 for war.

"During these one hundred years fifty of them were devoted to human slaughter.

"The cost of our own civil war was $6,508,420,909.

* * * * * * * *

"Europe is expending on her armies $814,000,000 annually.

"No wonder the children of the Old World have been seeking a new home!

"Should humanity weep in order that tyrants may laugh?

"Should the homes of the people be loaded down with billions of debt in order that some heartless murderer may wear a diadem?

"The wretches that have wrought this desolation are the panthers, the hyenas, and the ghouls of humanity.

"I appeal to you, brave men of many battles, who have seen and felt and comprehended! I cry out to you to throw your influence into the scales and urge the world to seek some forum where the arbitrator shall not be the dripping sword.

"War is demoralizing.

"War is desolating.

"War consumes the toil and comfort of our people.

"War is the world's terrible, relentless, remorseless inquisition.

"War is the weapon of tyrants, the prop of thrones.

"War, the black pathway to hell, has been the pretended passage to heaven."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to the question of appropriations for the Navy of the United States; and let me say that I am proud of the American Navy. During my short service on the Naval Committee I have had some opportunity to study the history of the achievements of the American Navy, and from the beginning to the end I, with every other patriotic American, feel proud of that history and those achievements. From the days of Paul Jones on down to the days of George Dewey and Winfield Schley the achievements of the American Navy have become the heritage of the American people, and the distinguished services of these men have shed luster on the American name.

I must, therefore, not be understood in what I am about to say as offering any objection to the proper, legitimate enlargement of the American Navy. I believe some of my colleagues on the committee are in some measure unwise; that they have been swept off their feet by the great enthusiasm for war that has swept over the country during the last two years. But I shall not stop here now to discuss the question whether we should have two more battle ships built or two more armored cruisers or three more protected cruisers. I believe they are not all needed.

But I proceed now to the consideration of the provisions of the bill against which the minority of the committee have entered their protest and filed their views. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] who has just taken his seat in the beginning of his remarks referred to the fact that the minority of this committee in filing their views had violated every precedent in the history of the Naval Committee. He referred to the fact also that those of us who have dared defy the precedents of the Naval Committee were new members with but little experience.

I desire to say to the gentleman in reply that if it be the custom, as he intimates, of the Naval Committee that a minority should absolutely submit to the will of the majority, and so perfectly acquiesce in it as not to make their wishes or opinions known on this floor, then that custom is more honored in the breach than in the observance, and I am proud of having broken it.

I desire to say to him further, and I am sorry that he is not in his seat to hear what I say, that if his other suggestion that the members of the committee who have filed minority views here are the inexperienced members of the committee, I think it would be well for this House and for the country if we had a few more inexperienced members on that committee.

I want to say also that when he speaks of the new members on that committee having ventured to violate the custom of the committee by bringing in a minority report, I think they have done themselves credit and the country a service when they have presented here views which justify their position and facts which can not be controverted by the gentleman from West Virginia or the majority of the committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to devote a few moments of time to the consideration of two propositions which the gentleman from West Virginia has brought forward. He has, in attempting to substantiate the position of the majority of the committee on the question of whether or not any of the new vessels provided in this bill should be constructed in the navy-yards of the Government, brought in as evidence or testimony for the support of his position the gentleman who presides over the great American Navy, the Hon. John D. Long, Secretary of the Navy, and one or two others of the naval officers who appeared before the committee, and who seem to be very friendly to private contractors, but he seemed to take particular pains in steering clear of the testimony of those experts whose particular business it is to know something about the construction of Government ships in the navy-yards.

I want to say to him that if he had taken the advice of the officers of the Navy who appeared before our committee, stating facts and figures rather than opinions, and having experience which would enable them to give good, solid, sensible advice, he would not have been able in good conscience to stand on this floor and say as he did—at least as I understood him to say—that the officers of the Navy Department were against building these ships in the navy-yards.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman will pardon me, but I do not think he is quite correct——

Mr. VANDIVER. I would yield to the gentleman himself if he were present; and if I am mistaken, I will allow him to correct my remarks.

The gentleman from West Virginia based his argument on this point mainly upon the question of cost, saying that it had cost the Government more to build the ships that it had built in navy-yards than it would have cost to build them by private contract. He brought to bear the statement that in the navy-yards men work only eight hours a day instead of ten, as in private yards.

He brought to bear also the statement, as I remember it, that the competition of these private yards kept down the cost of these vessels to reasonable prices, while in the navy-yards our experience had proven that without any competition we were unable to build ships as cheaply.

Now, I refer to the testimony of Constructor Stahl, who appeared before our committee with real facts and figures. He presented to us a tabular comparison of the contract price with the total cost of certain ships. He showed, for instance, that the Monterey had cost $2,268,281, while the contract price for that vessel was only $1,647,000; that the Olympia had cost the Government $2,484,027, while the contract price was only $1,796,000; that the San Francisco had cost the Government $1,738,000, while the contract price was only $1,423,000; that the Oregon had cost the Government $5,914,021, while the contract price was only $3,272,000; that the Massachusetts had cost the Government $5,401,844, while the contract price was only $3,045,576; that the Indiana had cost the Government $5,333,708, while the contract price was only $3,055,272; and he explained to us very satisfactorily that the difference between the actual cost to the Government and the contract price grew out of the fact that when the Government builds its ships by contract the vessel is brought into the navy-yard in an unfinished state, utterly unequipped and incomplete, and that it costs the Government hundreds of thousands and in some of these instances millions of dollars to complete the vessel afterwards.

Mr. ROBB. I should like to ask the gentleman whether the statement he has just given includes the amount of the claim now pending in this House by the William Cramp & Sons' Ship and Engine Building Company on account of the Massachusetts and the Indiana, that claim amounting to nearly $1,000,000?

Mr. VANDIVER. If I understand the facts, it does not.

Now, Mr. Chairman, only one other remark on this part of the subject. Every naval constructor who appeared before the Naval Committee, giving testimony from his experience and his expert knowledge of the subject, recommended to the committee that at least three of these vessels should be constructed in the navy-yards.

Now, it seems to me not only unwise but a very strange and anomalous condition that this great Government, with immense navy-yards for the purpose of equipping and repairing naval vessels, should go on from year to year and never have a vessel built in one of those navy-yards. It seems to me that a navy-yard properly equipped for the repair of vessels must of necessity be also equipped for building naval vessels; and if properly equipped, then why should we not have some of our vessels built in those navy-yards?

I say, therefore, that the gentleman from West Virginia, in arguing this question and planting himself in the first part of his speech on the wisdom and intelligence of those who had had experience in this matter, failed to follow out the conclusions of his own premises. If he had been willing to accept the wisdom and the advice of those gentlemen who have had experience, he would have found himself at a different conclusion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one other proposition is of great importance and has been much discussed; that is the question of armor plate.

The gentleman from West Virginia devoted a very large part of his speech of an hour and a half to the consideration of this question of the manufacture of armor plate, and as it seemed to me he ably championed the interest of private corporations and manufacturers of armor plate for the Government. I propose to show that the gentleman's argument is not only fallacious, but that it is utterly false and without foundation.

Now, sir, I am in favor of the Government establishing an armor-plate factory of its own, not only because I think the cost of armor plate as charged by the private manufacturers is too large, but I think there are other reasons also to support such a proposition.

Experience has proven that it is an exceedingly difficult thing for this Government to protect itself against the greed and cupidity of the people who make armor plate and who have a financial interest in defrauding the Government as far as practicable when it comes to the character of the plate they put upon our vessels.

I have been somewhat surprised at the position assumed by gentlemen in this regard, and if my time allowed me I would quote sufficiently from the testimony here to establish the proposition, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the Government has been defrauded in this practice to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars. I will take only enough time to refer briefly to what has occurred.

In 1894, under the authority of a resolution passed by Congress, the Naval Committee of this House, headed by the distinguished and able gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS], investigated this whole subject and brought their testimony and their report before the House. That report and the testimony accompanying it amply justify and fully confirm the statement which I have made, that this Government has found very great difficulty in protecting itself against the frauds of the manufacturer of armor plate; and if for no other reason than that, I should defend the building by the Government of a plate factory for the manufacture of armor plate such as it may need from time to time, because I believe it to be the only way by which we can secure armor of the best quality, uniform in all of its characteristics, armor plate that can be relied upon when it is placed between guns of the enemy and the bodies of our seamen.

That the Carnegie Company systematically defrauded the Government is not disputed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if that be true, why should this Government from year to year depend on these parties for the armor plate that we need, and why should it pay them the arbitrary price which they demand?

I read from the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, second session of the Fifty-third Congress, Report No. 1468, on page 4. You remember that in the making of this plate the workmen at the forge are under the supervision of officers of the company, and these workmen in charge of the duty of keeping these plates in the furnaces for a certain length of time have to report to the superintendent exactly how long each plate was so kept and that it had remained in the furnace exactly that particular time. These men made their reports and entered the figures on their books. Now, says the report of this Committee on Naval Affairs, after a full investigation:

> The figures were taken by the clerk to the superintendent, W. A. Kline, who had charge of the heating of the plates. The records show that the superintendent almost invariably changed the figures. In some cases he returned to the clerk an entirely new report in his own handwriting.

I have not time to read all of the testimony, but only a very little of it. From page 303, in the examination of Lieutenant Ackerman, I read a part of the testimony:

> The CHAIRMAN. He says:
> "And 2359-A was just given an oil bath without being heated; then put in the furnace five minutes to burn the oil off."
> What is supposed to be the object of treating the plate that way, supposing the testimony to be true?
> Lieutenant ACKERMAN. To deceive the inspector and also to say that they had treated it, or rather to be able to say that they had treated it.
> The CHAIRMAN. Well, would a test of that plate tell whether it had been treated or not? This plate, bear in mind, had not been treated at all, according to what they say, but just given an oil bath without being heated and then put into the furnace five minutes to burn the oil off.

Mr. Chairman, I read again from page 89 of the testimony of Mr. T. F. Farley. He says:

> Since I went back to work after the strike the system of concealing imperfections from the Government inspectors has been pursued. Plates have been frequently taken off the planers and placed in such position as to conceal the imperfections until they could hammer, patch, and plug the plates in the absence of the inspectors.

Now, Mr. Chairman, finally I read from page 59 of the report. The chairman says:

> Mr. Dunphy says the workmen would send in a slip or memoranda with "three hours" on it, and somebody in the office would change it to thirty hours; and, for instance, if he worked four hours at tempering, the "4" would be rubbed out in the office and "8" put on. Now, I am informed that that committee have more than a thousand of those slips, and in nearly every instance a change has been made from the original stub preserved by the workman, and the slip as presented to the Government inspector in the office of the company.

Then the chairman says:

> Do you know how much truth there is in that charge?

Captain Sampson, now Admiral Sampson, who was then a witness before the committee, replied:

> Yes, sir; it was the practice, and Mr. Sill, as I think I mentioned once before, kept a memorandum of those slips to which Mr. Dunphy refers.

Again, on the same page, Mr. MONEY, of the committee, asked:

> Who was responsible for that?

Captain Sampson answered:

> The superintendent of the shop was responsible.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not read further from the testimony, but I read a short paragraph from the report of the committee, and, as I understand, it was a unanimous report. It is scathing. Hear it. I read from page 16:

> If the criminality of a wrongful act is to be measured by the deliberation with which it is committed, the magnitude of the evils likely to result from its perpetration, and the want of provocation with which it is done, the frauds that your committee have found are worthy to be called crimes.
> The servants of the Carnegie Steel Company, whether with or without the knowledge of the company to increase their gains, deliberately continued for month after month to commit acts whose natural and probable consequence would be the sacrifice of the lives of our seamen in time of war, and with them, perhaps, the dearest interests of the nation.

This was against the Carnegie Company. I make no charge against the Bethlehem Company, as I know of nothing of this kind against them.

But now, Mr. Chairman, with that report of a committee of Congress before us, with that information before us, undisputed, I do not see how it is within the range of reason that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] should stand up here and argue for the great patriotism of the manufacturers of armor plate and protest against what he calls "punishing them" by building our own armor factory.

I say that if for no other reason I should prefer to have the Government manufacture its armor plate in order that it might secure the very best armor, and that every plate put on a battle ship should be of the very best possible that can be made. As long as we leave it to private manufacturers they will be constantly tempted to profit by the frauds that they can commit on the Government and to put weak, untreated armor in place of the strongest, hardest, and best.

Now, as to the other question, Mr. Chairman, the question of cost, I desire to devote a very few minutes to that. If I had the time, I think I could put before the House the evidence to show that the Government itself can make armor plate as cheaply as any private factory can make it.

And now I want to call your attention to this one fact, that the Government has, by a special committee, examined into this matter; and the Senate committee, appointed in 1897, has gone thoroughly into this subject, and the chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, Mr. CHANDLER, of New Hampshire, an ardent friend of the Navy and ex-Secretary of the Navy, has made a full and favorable report.

At the conclusion of that report that committee informed us that a Government armor-plate factory could be established for the sum of $1,500,000, and that it is expedient to establish such a factory in case the armor manufacturers decline to accept such prices for armor as may be fixed by law.

Furthermore, I read from the same report, page 23:

> That a fair average to be paid for armor for the three new battle ships authorized by the act of June 10, 1896, will be between three hundred and four hundred dollars per ton.

I want to say that those figures were arrived at by a most liberal system of computation and that the testimony before that committee was that $250 a ton was an ample price for the actual cost of armor plate, not allowing for profit.

I will further say that the testimony was most conclusive on that point, and as the conclusion of my time draws near, I shall only read a very brief extract from the testimony. Ex-Secretary Herbert, in his report to Congress of December 31, 1896, states as follows:

> It has been determined that the cost of the labor and material in a ton of double-forged nickel steel Harvey armor, including allowance for loss in manufacture, is $197.78, which comprises every element of cost in its manufacture, save and except only the maintenance of the plant.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if that be true—and I believe that even the gentleman from West Virginia, with all of his five years' of service on the committee, will have to concede that Secretary Herbert has a little more experience and a little better opportunity for knowledge than even he—if that be true, how is it possible for the majority of this committee to justify itself in coming before this House with a proposition to pay the armor-plate manufacturers $545 per ton?

Mr. BARBER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VANDIVER. I certainly will.

Mr. BARBER. You state there that Secretary Herbert made the entire cost $197 per ton. Is it not a fact that the Government for that armor furnished the nickel at $20 a ton in addition to that?

Mr. VANDIVER. I have read you the exact statement, I will say.

Mr. BARBER. Is it not a fact that he stated, in another part of the report, that the Government furnished the nickel for that armor, for which it paid $20 a ton?

Mr. VANDIVER. Assuming that it did, that will bring it up to only $217.

Mr. BARBER. Yes; and then the Government paid the royalty in addition, did they not?

Mr. VANDIVER. If I had time, I would gladly enter into the question of royalty, because I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania that I do not believe from the evidence I have examined, and I have gone through a great deal of it, that there is any legitimate ground on which the company can base a claim for the payment of any royalty. That question is still before the courts.

Now, my time has about expired, and I wish to make one other remark on this subject. I call the attention of the House to the memoranda which Admiral O'Neil, in his statement before the committee submitted to us, in which he gives the amount of armor plate and the price at which it has been furnished by these companies. On page 41 of the hearings of February 16 last I find that Admiral O'Neil has given us the information that in October, 1898, the Bethlehem Steel Company made a contract with the Government for 3,965 tons of armor, and that the armor was to be furnished at $400 per ton.

I find also that at the same time a contract was made with the Carnegie Steel Company for 3,712 tons, and that was to be at $400 per ton. I find again, in the same table, that last October, as late as October, 1899, this Government made a contract with the Carnegie Company and another contract with the Bethlehem Company to furnish armor at $400 a ton. Now, why should they demand $545 per ton?

Mr. BARBER. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. VANDIVER. Certainly.

Mr. BARBER. Will you kindly state what kind of armor that was for which that contract was made?

Mr. VANDIVER. Harveyized steel.

Mr. BARBER. Not the armor now asked for?

Mr. VANDIVER. Now, I want to say to my friend from Pennsylvania that that armor—harveyized steel—is the very best that has been used so far, and the testimony before the Naval Committee has never as yet shown that Krupp armor is any better—only this, that according to the testimony of Admiral O'Neil and some others before our committee it is possible by the Krupp process to make it more uniformly what is contracted for, and granting that, that makes it better, I will admit; yet I want to say that Krupp armor is not any better than harveyized armor at its best, and I think I have for that statement the authority of Admiral O'Neil himself, who says that he has no reason to believe that the Krupp process costs any more.

Mr. BARBER. Will you read what he says about it?

Mr. VANDIVER. In other words, that harveyized armor plate is sometimes made as good as a plate of the Krupp armor; and, furthermore, I want to say that we have before this committee no evidence whatever to show that Krupp armor really costs any more than harveyized armor.

Mr. GAINES. Will my friend yield to me?

Mr. BARBER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. VANDIVER. I will yield now to the gentleman from Tennessee and afterwards to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GAINES. It is a historical fact that the Krupp process is not a recent one; and is it not a fact that it was in use in Europe when the harveyized iron was carried over there by Carnegie and these other companies who underbid and sold it, and caused harveyized steel to be used in Europe?

Mr. VANDIVER. I think it is.

Mr. GAINES. My information is that that is the fact.

Mr. BARBER. But is that the fact? In his testimony Secretary Long and Admiral O'Neil both say that this Krupp iron did not come into existence until about two years ago, and was not manufactured until then.

Mr. GAINES. It was proved that it was an old patent last session by the gentleman from California, Mr. Hilborn.

Mr. BARBER. Read the portion of Admiral O'Neil's statement in which he says that Krupp armor only came in two years ago.

Mr. VANDIVER. The arguments will all be gone over by those who have more time than I have just now.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from West Virginia closed his speech with the statement that the Government would not be able to manufacture armor for less than $800 or $1,000 per ton. I have heard that statement before and I have examined carefully the testimony before this committee and the testimony before other committees that have reported on this subject, and I am here to say that these figures are given by the gentleman from West Virginia, not from any facts that he had before him, but out of the pure fiction of his own imagination.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I fear that I am overrunning my time, as I have promised to yield a few moments to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McDOWELL]. Before yielding the floor, however, I would like to ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of inserting some facts on this subject and some branches of a cognate subject which I have not had time to present.

IMPERIALISM THE ISSUE.

Mr. Chairman, are we ready to change our form of government from a republic to an empire? This is the real question before the American people. What are the advantages to be gained and the losses to be suffered? It is not a new question, as some suppose. There have always been some people in our country who considered a constitutional monarchy the best form of government.

Alexander Hamilton believed it, and said so in the great constitutional convention of 1787. The only difference between him and the Republican statesmen of to-day is that they repudiate it in their utterances, but seek to accomplish it in their actions, while he openly avowed his preference for monarchy, and deplored the fact that the convention was obliged to frame a constitution which the people would adopt, and hence it must be a republic, although, in his judgment, no republic had ever succeeded in bestowing such blessings upon its citizens as had the English monarchy. Here are his words as reported by Madison. I read from Madison's Constitutional Debates, Volume II, speeches of Alexander Hamilton, page 885, June 18, 1787:

> This view of the subject almost led him (Hamilton) to despair that a republican government could be established over so great an extent. He was sensible, at the same time, that it would be unwise to propose one of any other form. In his private opinion, he had no scruple in declaring—supported as he was by the opinion of so many of the wise and good—that the British Government was the best in the world, and that he doubted much whether anything short of it would do in America.

Then, on page 887:

> As to the Executive—
> Said Colonel Hamilton—
> it seemed to be admitted that no good one could be established on republican principles. Was not this giving up the merits of the question, for can there be a good government without a good executive? The English model was the only good one on the subject.
> The hereditary interest of the King was so interwoven with that of the nation, and his personal emolument so great, that he was placed above the danger of being corrupted from abroad; and at the same time was both sufficiently independent and sufficiently controlled to answer the purpose of the institution at home. One of the weak sides of republics was their being liable to foreign influences and corruption. Men of little character, acquiring great power, become easily the tools of intermeddling neighbors.

> What is the inference from all these observations? That we ought to go as far, in order to attain stability and permanency, as republican principles will admit. Let one branch of the legislature hold their places for life, or at least during good behavior. Let the executive also be for life.

Then, from page 892, section 10, of Hamilton's Plan of Government:

> All laws of the particular States contrary to the Constitution or laws of the United States to be utterly void; and the better to prevent such laws being passed, the governor of each State shall be appointed by the General Government, and shall have a negative upon the laws about to be passed in the State of which he is to be governor or president.

I read again from page 886:

> The progress of the public mind led him [Colonel Hamilton] to anticipate the time when others, as well as himself, would join in the praise bestowed by Mr. Neckar on the British constitution; namely, that it is the only government in the world "which unites public strength with individual security."

And added:

> Their House of Lords is a most noble institution. * * * no temporary Senate will have firmness enough to answer the purpose.

By temporary Senate he referred to the plan then under discussion, to elect Senators for the term of seven years. He wanted them, if elected at all, to be elected "for life," as remarked before.

Other great minds in that Convention seriously doubted the wisdom of trusting all the power of government in the hands of the people. While they rejoiced in having freed their country from the tyranny of kings, they were unable to free their minds from the influence of long-standing monarchical customs and theories of government inherited from the mother country. The Declaration of Independence had been proclaimed eleven years before, and the best blood of America had sealed its adoption. But its vital truths were again assailed, and this time imperiled in the very Convention which was to give them application in the organic law of the land.

But in that Convention the spirit of Jefferson and the voice of Franklin prevailed (though the former was himself serving his country in a distant land) and rebuked the distrust, restored confidence, and framed a free Constitution—the best which the wisdom of man has ever devised for the government of a great nation—a Constitution which was described by De Tocqueville as "a new discovery in modern political science," and by Lord

Brougham as "the very greatest refinement in social policy to which any state of circumstances has ever given rise or to which any age has ever given birth."

From that day to this that Constitution has been the bulwark of our freedom, the sheet anchor of our political faith, the Magna Charta of our liberties. Shall we abandon it? That is the question. Shall we ignore it for the cheap glory which flatters our vanity in waving a flag over distant islands of the sea, while we deny to their inhabitants the blessings which it guarantees to us? If so, I want to know what we are to gain by the change. What have we to gain and what to lose?

Gentlemen who uphold this imperial policy have not the courage to call it by its right name. They call it expansion, growth, development, spread of civilization, "Christian civilization;" and tell us that we are to gain great prestige among the nations of the world and great commercial advantages for our enterprising people.

Prestige and power, commerce and development, glory and destiny, these are the seductive phrases behind which imperialism seeks to conceal its hideous form. Examine them. They are the favorite expressions of the imperialist. They are not mine; they are his. Add to these the magic words "trade," "profit," "per cent," "the flag" (with "the appropriation" attached), and "the gospel," and you have exhausted the vocabulary of this new imperialism, which comes to us in the guise of "benevolent assimilation."

Opposed to these I pluck from the vocabulary of true Americanism the words "home," "country," "native land," "freedom," "truth," "duty," "justice," "honor," "integrity," "humanity," "right," "life," "liberty," and "happiness." These are the terms in which exalted patriotism lifts its voice above the clamor of the hypocritical stock gamblers and speculators. The others are the best terms which the apologists for the new doctrine of empire can employ to conceal their policy.

Now, examine these pretenses and see what they claim for us. Stripped of all their glittering verbiage, they are all resolved into three—the glory of prestige, the prospect of profit, and the sanction of Providence. These, and only these, have been in various forms put forward by the President and his champions on this floor. I invite you to analyze them, examine them in detail.

"Prestige!" Think about it, gentlemen, as an excuse for abandoning the principles of our fathers, principles which have for four generations pointed us to the paths of peace and honor. Think of it, gentlemen, as an excuse for an expensive and destructive foreign war. Aye, gentlemen, think of it as the glittering bauble with which ambitious kings are wont to amuse themselves.

We are told by a distinguished Administration Senator [Mr. BEVERIDGE] that this new prestige is to be "an instrument of statecraft, looking to our future as the dominant power of the world." Let me remind you that we have been the dominant power in the Western Hemisphere ever since James Monroe announced to the world that no European nation would be allowed to acquire territory or meddle in the affairs of this continent.

That "prestige" has been maintained as a safeguard for our own interests and a protection to the liberties of the Central and South American republics from that day to this, and even Grover Cleveland won the plaudits of America in the declining days of his career by reasserting it. But the Monroe doctrine is now to be abandoned and our power in the Western Hemisphere to be surrendered for the privilege of mixing up in the petty quarrels of Eastern despots, being eternally involved in the turmoil of European politics.

In short, we are to exchange the absolute power which the Monroe doctrine gave us over the destiny of the Western Hemisphere for the privilege of wearing a Chinese pigtail in the Orient and a British badge in the rest of the world, and call it "prestige."

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the prospect of profit, I desire to submit only a few brief observations. First, let me say that this low plane of consideration for a great national policy, or change of policy, is exceedingly discreditable to us as a people. But it has been coldly and brutally asserted by Administration Senators and editors who support this expansion movement that the Philippine Islands are to be held and forcibly annexed to the United States because they afford a profitable opportunity for the investment of American capital and a field for the development of American industries.

It is a base and unworthy motive; but base and unworthy as it is, it must be met, because there are some people who are unable to rise to the consideration of any higher question than that of gain or loss. So, putting the question on this low plane, I want to know who it is we are legislating for? Are we to consider the interests of the whole people or only a favored few? It seems to me that this question of material gain or loss must be treated from the standpoint of three different parties.

First, will the average American citizen, without capital, find anything to induce him to form a settlement in the Philippine Islands? Will he go there to secure employment or to establish a home? Let us be practical and sensible if we are going to reason on the basis of business prudence. You know it is utter folly to expect American laborers to go there and compete with Chinese and Filipinos who work for 10 cents a day. You know, too, that the climate is such that a white man can scarcely endure it, and no American citizen is going there to build a home for himself and family. You tell us that it is to offer a field for development by our children as they grow up.

God grant that mine may never be driven out of the heaven-blessed land of their birth to hunt for a home among the sands and fever-stricken swamps of Luzon and Mindanao. I bid you remember, sir, that the population of the United States is not more than 23 persons to the square mile, and in the Philippine Islands it is 73, or more than three times as thick. Climate, distance, and population, then, will altogether exclude the probability of the average American getting anything out of this investment. Then for whom is it made?

Consider it, secondly, from the standpoint of the Government. Are we as a nation to profit by it? Remember that the total imports of the islands have never averaged more than $12,000,000 a year, and the collection of one-half that sum in taxes would be enormous, even under the most rapacious and cold-blooded system of taxation without representation, so that six millions a year would be a large sum to expect as the revenues of the province, if province you make it.

Over against that sum place the expense of an army and navy and a long list of carpetbag governors, judges, marshals, and other civil officers, with transportation from seven to ten thousand miles—for all of these things must be taken into consideration—and you will find that not six millions, nor even sixty millions, will cover the bill. During the present fiscal year three times sixty millions will scarcely more than meet the expense account of our Philippine investment. After we have subdued the natives—if anybody can tell when that is to be—perhaps the budget will not be so large.

But an army of twenty to forty thousand men will always be needed there to keep down insurrections, and a large naval force sufficient to guard our possessions against the encroachments of other powers will always be considered necessary for the maintenance of our sovereignty. I do not see how the annual appropriations from the United States Treasury for the naval, military, and civil administration of these islands can be reduced much below a hundred millions of dollars, and it is likely to be much more.

In short, then, with an income of six millions a year—which in time, possibly by enlarged importations, might be increased to ten millions—the Government expense account would have to be evened up by drawing from the Treasury of the United States about $90,000,000 of the people's money each year. This is the investment we are asked to make, and call it profitable.

But in the third place I think I can see a prospect of profit for certain people who have money to put into such enterprises as railroads, street-car lines, electric-light plants, waterworks, and other things in the nature of monopolies, which require a Government charter or franchise, provided they are in touch with the Administration which will control these franchises.

Already this is being done to some extent, and as soon as peaceable conditions prevail I apprehend there will be some rush of capital for this kind of investment. In short, sir, these islands are to be exploited by the adventurous speculators and contractors who are the friends and favored pets of the Government, and in a few years every valuable public franchise will be in the hands of this class of people.

We know how difficult it is to curb their selfishness at home, when their extortions are under our own eyes and their powerful protectors in the Government to some extent amendable to public sentiment. But when they are 10,000 miles removed from all restraint of the people that make the government, who shall set bounds to their exactions? These are the people who want the islands and will reap the profit.

But, sir, who shall hear the complaint of underpaid labor and overtaxed public? You answer, "The colonial governor." Yes; the colonial governor, the royal governor, who holds his high commission, not from the people of the country which he is to govern; no; not from the people of any country, but from the emperor at Washington, on the opposite side of the globe, the governor and the franchise grabber in partnership, the governor and taxgatherer in one.

This is the history of colonial government from the days of the Persian satrap and the Roman proconsul down to the last of the British viceroys in India and South Africa. Aye, sir, from the time of Christ, when the Roman government farmed out the taxes of Judea to be collected on the shares by a greedy governor, down to the scourge of suffering Ireland by British landlords, the "publican" has been a term of reproach and the foreign taxgatherer an object of universal hatred. Cicero denouncing the tyranny of the Roman governor over Sicily made the name of Veres the symbol of immortal infamy.

Macaulay immortalizes the victorious career of Lord Clive, the first franchise governor of India, but must apologize for his pillage. Edmund Burke, in the greatest oration ever delivered by an Englishman, forever embalmed the name of Warren Hastings in the literature of colonial misgovernment. The English landlords have for three hundred years sucked the best blood of Ireland, until famine, pestilence, and poverty have well-nigh crushed the spirit of the most heroic race whose valor ever inspired the world. And now Great Britain's most gigantic effort of the century is being made to stretch the royal scepter over the republics of South Africa, whose heroic resistance kindles the admiration of freemen in every quarter of the globe.

In fact, sir, a large part of the history of the world is taken up with this struggle for empire; and lately it seems to have broken out afresh. On both sides of the Atlantic great military and naval armaments are being fitted out for conquest in distant lands. British imperialism is crushing the spirit of liberty in South Africa, while McKinley imperialism, having repudiated the noble sentiment that "forcible annexation is criminal aggression," now hurls our brave battalions against the weak and helpless Filipinos, who refuse to submit to a foreign yoke and a colonial government, which is condemned by all experience and all wisdom.

Mr. Chairman, on this very point the greatest English historian since the death of Lord Macaulay has been often quoted, and I read here his exact words.

I read from the first chapter of James Anthony Froude's Sketch of Cæsar, one of the most thoughtful works of history which has been given to the world during the last quarter of the century:

> The early Romans possessed the faculty of self-government beyond any people of whom we have historical knowledge, with the one exception of ourselves. In virtue of their temporal freedom, they became the most powerful nation in the known world; and their liberties perished only when Rome became the mistress of conquered races to whom she was unable or unwilling to extend her privileges.
> If England were similarly supreme, if all rival powers were eclipsed by her or laid under her feet, the imperial tendencies, which are as strongly marked in us as our love for liberty, might lead us over the same course to the same end. If there be one lesson which history teaches, it is this: That free nations can not govern subject provinces. If they are unable or unwilling to admit their dependencies to share their own constitution, the constitution will fall in pieces from mere incompetence for its duties.

I repeat this "one lesson which history teaches." "It is this" (hear it, gentlemen; it ought to be engraven in granite): "that free nations can not govern subject provinces." I sincerely wish that it may be written in the hearts of my countrymen.

Mr. Chairman these are not the words of a politician. They are not the words of a flatterer seeking favor at the White House. They are the words of a great man, far removed from political prejudice. They are solemn words of warning from the high priest of history.

And now, sir, alongside of them I desire to place the words of another great historian, whose work will ever be cherished as one of the highest achievements of the human mind. I quote from memory, as the volume is not now at my command. But Lord Gibbon, in his great work The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, informs us that—

> The wisest advice which Augustus Cæsar left to his successors was that they should confine the empire to the limits which nature had prescribed for it.

The fatal results of not following that advice are fully set forth by the great historian. But the story is too well known. I need not repeat it. Ambition for empire has been the ruin of great statesmen and great soldiers, as well as great governments, monarchies, and republics, in all ages. The story is the same, whether Cambyses goes out to conquer Egypt, or Alexander to add the kingdoms of Asia to his dominion; whether Xerxes crosses the Hellespont, or Cæsar pauses on the banks of the Rubicon.

It is the same whether George the Third hurls his British regulars against American patriots, or William McKinley dispatches our fleets and armies to the conquest of the Orient. It is unbridled ambition, the ruin of men and of nations.

Mr. Chairman, heretofore the student of history and politics could only point to the general tendency of events and the fondness of the Republican party for strong centralized government, and designate their policy as one of imperialism. No thoughtful, candid man, acquainted with the history of nations, could deny that charge. But the plausible politician could evade it by fixing the attention of voters upon more concrete questions and other diseases of the body politic, because they were in their more acute stages.

But last week this question of imperialism versus democracy was lifted out of the region of historical investigation and the refinements of political philosophy into the clear sunlight of present experience. It is no longer a political or metaphysical abstraction. It is now a substantial and concrete question.

Your Porto Rican bill is the very embodiment of concrete imperialism. The issue is clearly defined: Shall the United States of America be a republic, or shall it be an empire governed by a monarch?

The very essence of imperialism is centralized power in the hands of one man, backed by an army to execute his commands. Whenever that power extends to the government of distant provinces, it becomes tyrannical and despotic. Your Porto Rican tariff bill was bad enough; so bad, indeed, that it met with a storm of abuse even from the Republican press throughout the country.

But your Porto Rican civil government bill, which you tacked on to it and rushed through this House with only three hours for its consideration, is ten times worse, and I believe will meet with the condemnation which it deserves before the ides of November come.

That bill, while pretending to be for the relief of the distressed people of that island, fastens upon them an army of Government officials, appointed by the President, with fat salaries to be drawn from the sweat and the toil of Porto Rican taxpayers, and with every opportunity for pillage and plunder—salaries 25 per cent higher, too, than the average salaries of State officers throughout the Union. Every executive officer, from the governor down to the spittoon cleaner, is to be a carpetbagger appointed from Washington—a politician repudiated and out of a job at home.

There is a part of the secret of it—a hundred or a thousand more places to be filled with hungry office-seekers, living on the proceeds of other men's labor, and fattening on the plunder of the people who came under our flag because they thought it was the symbol of freedom. They came willingly, too. They offered no resistance to the army of General Miles. They hoisted our flag, believing it stood for our Constitution and our free institutions.

And now, not content with filling their executive offices, you go further and appoint the upper house of their legislative assembly, their State senators. And to make your power more secure, you give this alien-appointed governor the veto power so framed as to make it practically absolute over all their legislation. Do you pretend to believe that these extraordinary powers of carpet-bag rule will not be abused? I tell you that the history of the world affords no example to encourage your belief.

On the contrary, I assert, and am prepared to prove, that no colonial system of government by officers appointed from a distance ever was, in any country or any age of the world, for any length of time administered for the good of the governed. The satraps of Persia ruined every province of the empire. The proconsuls of Rome demolished Carthage, and finally impoverished every province from the Euphrates to the Pillars of Hercules.

Spain crushed the life out of every colony she had. English colonial governors, though less rapacious than others, drove the American colonies to revolt. English gold-hunters and government speculators are now crushing out the republics of South Africa, and a hundred millions of people are now groaning and starving under British rule in India.

Mr. Chairman, in proof of this last statement, one has only to reflect on the history of British rule in India; how a great corporation (the East India Company) grew rich out of the robbery of the natives and then became the governing power of the country, embracing as it now does a population of 200,000,000 of people, who are kept in such abject poverty that a failure of a single crop brings a famine upon the whole land.

So great indeed has the distress become that on an average once in every three years the people of that once prosperous country must appeal to the charity of other lands for relief. To-day they are starving by the millions in a land which only a few years ago furnished breadstuffs for half the population of London. Two years ago the colony of British subjects of India then residents in London made a formal appeal, which was published in the London Times, from which I quote these words:

> That this conference of Indians resident in the United Kingdom is of opinion that all of the evils and "terrible misery" that India has been suffering for a century and a half, and of which the latest developments are the most deplorable famine and plague arising from ever-increasing poverty. That of all of these the main cause is the unrighteous and un-British system of government which produces an unceasing and ever-increasing bleeding of the country, and which is maintained by a political hypocrisy and subterfuge unworthy of British honor. * * * remembering that England drains from India some £30,000,000 ($150,000,000) per year.

After all, Mr. Chairman, I feel that this is the real cause why the "power behind the throne" here is pushing the Administration on in its mad rush for colonial empire. They expect to drain from Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines as British landlords and bondholders drain from India and South Africa. In the name of humanity and justice, I ask, sir, why we are to ignore for their benefit the lessons already learned and so forcibly impressed by the history of other nations?

You tell us it is "Providence;" "it is manifest destiny;" "it is survival of the fittest." I tell you, in reply, I do not believe that Providence ever ordained the sword and the Gatling gun as instruments for the spread of "Christian civilization"—if, indeed, there is any such thing in this selfish world as a "Christian civilization"—terms which have come to be only a cloak of hypocrisy to conceal the devil's own purposes. I do not believe that Providence licensed 300 saloons in Manila in six months after Americans took control as missionaries of Christian life and doctrine. I do not believe your "doctrine of survival of the fittest" is anything more than the survival of the strongest and robbery of the weakest.

Aye, sir, the plea of Providence and destiny is the same old pretense with which ambitious tyrants in all ages have salved their consciences when starting out to pillage and plunder their neighbors. William McKinley salves his conscience with the same unction that George III applied to his.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BROSIUS). The gentleman from Missouri asks permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri, before he takes his seat, if it is not a fact that the Bethlehem Company sold harveyized armor plate in Europe for $249 a ton?

Mr. VANDIVER. It is a fact that the Carnegie Company sold the Russian Government armor plate at $250 a ton, and I have no evidence to show that it was any less than the cost of it.

Mr. GAINES. The company never claimed that it was less than the cost of it, and there is no record to show it.

Mr. VANDIVER. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. VANDIVER. I yield that time to the gentleman from Ohio. I believe my colleague on the committee, Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, wishes to address the House.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent of the committee, before I begin, to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to print therein some figures and data.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to print some figures and data. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, in supporting the efforts of my colleagues in behalf of the bill now before this body for consideration I find many sources of satisfaction. In the first place, I deem it an honor to be a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, whose work forms so important a part of the duties of the House of Representatives and which has to do, perhaps, more than any other committee with providing means for defending the national honor and protecting the vast business interests of the United States, both at home and abroad.

I derive no little pride from the fact that since I have been associated with that committee I have stood at all times with those of my colleagues who have steadfastly pursued the policy of building up a navy for the United States that will be adequate to the needs of so great and glorious a nation; for if ever a public policy has been vindicated, if ever the foresight of man in providing for the exigencies of the future has by subsequent events been demonstrated to have been wise, the history of the year 1898 can not be truthfully written without according honor and credit to those public men who, since 1883, have planned or aided in the schemes for the construction of a navy for the United States that would be commensurate with the urgent needs of this, the most important branch of the public defense.

I am also proud, Mr. Chairman, of the record that the State of New Jersey has made in connection with the United States Navy. She has three times been represented in the Cabinet by a Secretary of the Navy in the persons of Hon. Samuel L. Southard, Hon. Mahlon Dickerson, and by a predecessor in this House from my own Congressional district, Hon. George M. Robeson, and in the hands of these gentlemen reposed the administration of the Navy Department for eighteen years.

Not only has New Jersey been thus ably represented in the highest position of command of the Navy, but she has at all times, in every exigency of war, furnished her full quota of "the men behind the guns," and to-day she is conspicuous for her activity in the maintenance of the Naval Militia, which, in any future necessity, will offer for the nation's defense the services of the same gallant fighting material that supported the commanders in the memorable battles of Manila and Santiago.

The recent marvelous achievements of our Navy are so fresh in our minds that we can still hear the echoes of the battle cry that thrilled our sailor boys and spurred them on to victory, "Remember the Maine;" but appropriate and effective as was that reminder of the dastardly act to be avenged, it was applicable only to the war in which it originated. But there is another, an older, battle cry, one that has been repeated for a century and which will be appropriate for all time, "Don't give up the ship," and this appeal of a wounded officer, while being carried by his comrades from the front of a naval battle, was uttered by a worthy son of the State of New Jersey, Capt. James Lawrence, of Burlington.

Coming here as a member of Congress from a State that has been so closely identified with the affairs and deeds of the Navy, it is a source of great gratification to me that as a member of the Naval Committee, which on a former occasion presented to the House a scheme for the enlargement of the Navy, we provided, among other items, for the building of one of the mightiest and most formidable fighting ships ever designed, and which will be named the New Jersey; and if, sailing under the American flag, she shall be called upon to go forth in defense of our national honor, she will be a fitting emblem of that patriotic support that ever has been and ever will be given to the Navy by the State whose honored name she will bear.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, representing as I do in part so noble and patriotic a State, I am proud of the privilege of standing here to-day and placing upon the records of this House my indorsement of this bill, which contains, I believe, the proper and necessary, though not extravagant, provisions for still further advancing the efficiency of our already creditable but inadequate Navy.

In the light of recent events, it is difficult to understand how any gentleman on this floor can justify opposition to a reasonable scheme for the upbuilding of the Navy, which is recommended by our able Secretary of the Navy, indorsed by our most eminent authorities on matters pertaining to the needs of the naval service, concurred in and presented by the Committee on Naval Affairs after long and careful analysis of the various items and investigation as to the necessity for providing them.

If, in the face of the fact that the country demands effective defense of our property and commercial interests, there are members of this House who would hesitate to comply with those demands; let them invoke the spirit of our forefathers to guide their action upon this measure.

The records of the Continental Congress show that on the 13th of October, 1775, Silas Deane, John Adams, and John Langdon were appointed as a naval committee. This marked the origin of the Committee on Naval Affairs. They were authorized to provide two swift sailing vessels, one to carry 10 guns and a proportionate number of swivels and to be manned by 80 men, the other to carry 14 guns and the necessary number of men. This was the first official step toward the formation of a national American navy.

On October 30 of the same year, only seventeen days later, the Congress authorized the construction of two more ships, larger and more efficient than the others—one of 20 and the other of 36 guns—and at the same time the naval committee was enlarged by the addition of three members—Stephen Hopkins, Joseph Harris, and Richard Henry Lee.

Nine days later, on November 9, Congress authorized two battalions of marines to be raised.

On December 13, 1775, two months after it was appointed, the naval committee made its first report to Congress, recommending the construction of 13 ships—5 of 32 guns, 5 of 28 guns, and 3 of 24 guns capacity. This recommendation was approved by Congress, and the construction of the vessels was authorized. The estimated cost of these vessels was $900,000.

On December 22 of the same year the naval committee reported a list of naval officers, which included the names of Esek Hopkins as commander in chief and John Paul Jones as one of the first lieutenants.

The first naval effort or cruise of the infant navy was commanded by Esek Hopkins, and he embarked upon that mission only two and a half months after the appointment of the first naval committee.

Maclay describes Esek Hopkins as "a most experienced and venerable sea captain," and of his taking command of the first American fleet he says:

> At 9 o'clock on a clear, frosty morning early in January, 1776, he (Hopkins) slipped into his barge at the foot of Walnut street, Philadelphia, where a squadron of eight cruisers had been collected, and amidst the discharge of artillery and the cheers of the multitude he made his way through the floating ice to his flagship, the Alfred. When he gained the deck the signal was given, and Lieut. John Paul Jones hoisted a yellow silk flag bearing the device of a pine tree and a rattlesnake, with the motto, "Don't tread on me." This was the first flag hoisted on an American man-of-war.

Mr. Chairman, this historical event has additional interest for me, from the fact that on that occasion of the birth of the American Navy, when the plucky little squadron weighed anchor in the harbor of Philadelphia, in going forth to fight in the cause of liberty they sailed for 100 miles along the shore which forms a boundary of the district which I have the honor to represent. And it appears to be an appropriate coincidence that in the Delaware River harbor of Philadelphia, near the spot where the American Navy was born, there is located the shipyard wherein are constructed some of our powerful modern battleships, as well as some of the highest types of war vessels for foreign countries.

Mr. Chairman, the record which I have referred to as showing what was accomplished in a little more than two months by the first naval committee of the Continental Congress very clearly exhibits the energy and ability of our forefathers in the enactment of legislation looking toward the establishment of a navy. Grasping as if by magic a knowledge of the true situation presented by the impending struggle between the American colonies and Great Britain, they comprehended the fact that, like all other wars, the result of the conflict would be mainly a question of the superiority of naval force. How well they builded is clearly shown by the history of that memorable contest.

The Navy occupies a unique position in the affections of the people. At all times and in every country possessing a navy there has always existed among all classes of people a warmth of pride for the sailor which has not been bestowed upon any other class of men. This may be due to that peculiar condition of peril that always surrounds him, not only in war, but in time of peace. But above and beyond all these considerations is the keen appreciation and deep love which our people entertain for our Navy and its heroes, whose gallant deeds in all our conflicts fill many pages of history.

The country unanimously supports the policy of strengthening this the most important means of our country's defense. The people know that parsimony along this line proves in the end to be the wildest extravagance, and that logical and reasonable liberality in providing protection to our commercial interests at home and abroad is indeed a measure of true economy. We are a peaceful nation. We never have sought and never will seek a conflict with other nations, but the surest means of maintaining peace is to at all times be prepared for war.

The degree in which a nation is respected and feared is measured by the strength of its navy, and in all the international wars in the past that nation has come off victorious which has been supported by the strongest and most efficient navy.

Never before has there been so great a competition between the leading nations of the world in the line of foreign commerce as now, but foreign commerce can not be maintained to any considerable extent by a nation which is not prepared to protect its interests against the encroachments of stronger competitors for such trade. The United States is one of the most extensive producing nations, and upon the securing and maintaining of foreign markets for the surplus products of our factories and farms depend our prosperity, and for this purpose an efficient navy is required.

The present need for an increase of our Navy may be better comprehended from a comparative statement of the navies of the principal maritime powers of the world, the amount of our vast and rapidly increasing foreign commerce as compared with that of those nations, and also the number of miles of seacoast and navigable bays and rivers as compared with the seacoast of those countries. The various tables and figures which I have in this connection I will submit with my remarks and have them printed. While some of them have already been presented in the report of the committee and elsewhere, I have never seen them presented in this manner.

These show the amount of our commerce with foreign countries, the menace to our country from an extended exposed seacoast, and the danger to the safety of our interests in time of war. There is shown the strength of our Navy, which is to afford protection to our foreign trade.

When we compare the magnitude of our great and rapidly increasing commerce with that of other nations and reflect that we are more extensively exposed to the attack of hostile navies than any other nation, and yet our Navy ranks fourth among the navies of the leading nations of the earth, we realize the importance of increasing our Navy.

In addition to the demand for the protection of our foreign commerce, the greatest need of a navy is for our home protection. Do the members of this House know or appreciate the fact that the general or the outer coast line of the United States—not including that of Alaska, the Great Lakes, or any of our island possessions—lies exposed to the attack of hostile navies for a distance of 5,558 miles, and that, including the shores of navigable bays and rivers, the line thus exposed equals 58,995 miles, making in all an aggregate of 65,453 miles of our home shore open to attack and affording opportunities of landing hostile armies, opposed only by such inadequate coast and naval defense as we now possess? Considering the outer coast line of the United States, it is greater than that of any other principal country and is nearly one-half of the general coast line of Great Britain and Ireland, France, Germany, Russia in Europe, and Italy combined.

I submit herewith a table giving the details of our coast line with that of other countries.

In this connection, and speaking locally of my own State, I may say that nearly three-fourths of the boundary of New Jersey is washed by waters navigable by naval vessels, and of the district which I have the honor to represent each one of the five counties which compose it has a frontage upon such navigable waterway. Thus the security of life and property and the protection to trade and commerce of New Jersey, whose material wealth is more than one and a half billions of dollars, or nearly one-fortieth of that of the whole nation, depends largely upon the protection of an adequate navy.

While this bill proposes the appropriation of a larger amount of money than any other previous bill, yet it represents a very large reduction in the amount estimated for by the Department as being absolutely necessary.

The general complaint that has been made in the past concerning the appropriations for this Department of our public service, which has come under my observation, has been of a lack of sufficiency than otherwise.

The committee have given the matter careful and painstaking consideration, extending over many days and including voluminous hearings toward its preparation, and it is pleasurable to state in this connection that it is not the product of any partisan consideration, but represents the judgment of those who have considered this subject from a purely American standpoint, and is submitted by the committee with the hope and belief that it would commend itself to the approval of the House and of the country.

There was not an American citizen that possessed a spark of patriotic feeling for his country when the war was declared with Spain that was not filled with regret and humiliation that our Navy was so unprepared for a conflict that a great portion of an emergency appropriation of $50,000,000 was required toward supplying its deficiency in strength and in obtaining munitions of war, and that under that emergency great sums of money were sent abroad for those things that were so urgently needed—ships and supplies— that were the product of the labor of the underpaid mechanics of foreign countries.

Because of our dire necessity and the limited stock available, we were compelled to pay to the foreign manufacturers such prices as enabled them to reap tremendous profits. Had the warnings of the more liberal and patriotic members of the Naval Committees in recent Congresses been heeded, we should have found ourselves better prepared for our national defense, and those vast sums of money would have been expended in our own country in the purchase of American materials from American producers, and the building of the needed ships would have been by American mechanics and laborers who would have reaped the benefit of that labor for themselves and their families.

But the lesson of the Spanish-American war has been a useful one. All classes of citizens desire that there shall be no recurrence of the condition in which we found ourselves at the beginning of that war, and with this knowledge, and with a knowledge of how deficient our Navy is to-day as compared with the navies of the other great nations, we have prepared and presented this measure. It is not the product of partisan thought or action, but represents the careful and considerate thought and judgment of a true American spirit. It is merely a conservative step along that line of policy for our Navy that was begun in 1883, and is in conformity with the policy pursued by the other great maritime nations, although the increase proposed is not nearly so extensive as that planned by them.

No matter what our policy may be concerning our recent acquisitions, or how much diversity of thought and feeling regarding their final disposition or control, no matter whether they shall be colonies or Territories, the fact remains that with them, as without them, our foreign commerce has steadily increased, and will continue to increase until it reaches the remotest parts of the world where trade exists or where the intelligent, energetic, and persistent efforts of our American people can establish it. For the protection of this present and future commerce an efficient navy will be required.

All over our broad land, from the Great Lakes, with their untold wealth of commerce of the North, to the Gulf of Mexico, with its vast fleet of merchant vessels of the Southern trade; from the storm-ridden coast of the Atlantic, whence go forth vast volumes of our products to Europe, to the calm and peaceful shores of the Pacific, busy with the heretofore undreamed of commerce with the Orient, our people realize the pressing need of an increased Navy; and from this same broad expanse of country there comes to us the voice of our citizens approving every effort and every action that has been taken or that is proposed toward increasing, strengthening, and maintaining the efficiency of our Navy until it shall take rank with the navies of the foremost nations of the world.

The mightiest and most formidable battle ship modern ingenuity and ability can construct should be the flagship of an American admiral. The strongest, swiftest, and most efficient cruisers that plow the seas should float the Stars and Stripes. The most destructive and deceptive types of torpedo boats and fleet destroyers should belong to our squadron, and all be manned by our gallant boys, who have demonstrated that they are the highest type of naval warriors in the world, so that our naval power shall be recognized, not only by our people, but by all the world, as commensurate with the honor, dignity, and responsibility of this, the greatest nation under the sun.

Sufficient to peacefully guarantee on every sea, in every land and clime, full, ample, and absolute protection of the lives, liberties, and property of our humblest citizens who shall lawfully claim the protection of the American flag and all it implies, let the future American Navy stand as a synonym for peace, protection, and progressive civilization.

The reasons for this large appropriation are very clearly and tersely set forth in the report made by Chairman Foss, and are comprised in those items to be expended for the maintenance and increase of our fleet.

With regard to the present provisions for the support of the Navy, I desire to say that the amount carried in last year's bill was $48,099,969.58, and the amounts of the different deficiency bills was $5,245,000, making the total expenditure for 1900 $53,344,969.58.

The amount carried by the bill now before us is $61,209,916.67, which is $13,109,947.07 more than was carried by the naval appropriation act of last year, and but $7,864,947.09 more than the total appropriation for the last fiscal year. This difference is more than accounted for in the items of this bill which are expended or to be expended for the maintenance and increase of the Navy. The increase in the amount appropriated for the Bureau of Equipment is $698,597.42. This Bureau has charge of the equipping of our vessels, and the extra amount of last year's expenditures is but $322,597.42, and is made absolutely necessary to enable this Department to establish some new coaling stations and to provide for the increased cost of transportation of the supplies made necessary by reason of the distance between the base of supplies and so many of our vessels.

The Bureau of Yards and Docks has an increase of $154,997.60. This Bureau has charge of the maintenance of all our navy-yards and stations, and the demand for this increase comes from the improvement of the old yards and the establishment of the new ones.

The appropriation for public works is $2,332,180.82 more than last year. This is for the construction of new buildings and repairs to old ones; for the purchase of new machinery and tools; also for and on account of new dry docks at our various navy-yards. These new buildings comprise all kinds and classes of machine shops, construction building, equipment shops, and various others made necessary for the use of the different bureaus in order that the yards may be fitted in a proper degree to do the repair work necessary to be done now, and which, by the report, is far behind and awaiting an appropriation and these additions to make the yards efficient.

The increase for the Bureau of Construction and Repair is $3,000,000. The reason for this increase is made very clear in the testimony of Admiral Hichborn. He states that last year's appropriation was exhausted by February 1 and that the work has been practically suspended awaiting further appropriation; that the expenditure of the Department is at the rate of $500,000 per month; that there are now 43 vessels lying at the different yards requiring repair, and in addition to this there will be constantly added those vessels returning from the seat of war, all of which will need more or less repair work upon them.

For the Bureau of Steam Engineering the appropriation is increased $1,465,000. The reasons for this increase are practically the same as those set forth by Admiral Hichborn concerning the repairs of vessels. All of the vessels needing repair to their hull will also require new machinery or repairs on the old. Upon the proper efficiency of this branch depends very much the efficiency of our fleet. The speed and accurate working of the machinery of a vessel often determines success.

The increase in the different bureaus above set forth amounts to the sum of $7,650,775.84, or just about the difference in the amount carried in this bill and the total amount of the expenditures for the naval service during the last year.

The additional amount in this bill for the special item of increasing the Navy over the amount in last year's bill is $6,598,680.09. This increase is required in order that the Department may be able to make the payments on the new vessels under construction that become payable this year.

The total of these amounts above enumerated is $14,249,455.93, or more than $1,000,000 more than the difference between the amount carried in this bill and the amount appropriated in the naval bill of last year.

I have taken the above items of the bill in order to explain some of the reasons, and to me the most practical ones, for the increased appropriation. As this expenditure will be made in the direct line of maintaining the present efficiency of the vessels in the Navy, or of the plants required to repair them, or in the direct increase of our Navy, the need of the same is apparent and is clearly set forth in the reports of the Secretary of the Navy and the different bureau chiefs, and by their further testimony before the committee.

One of the additions to our navy-yards is new dry docks. We are now unable to dock our largest ships in any of our yards, except at New York or Puget Sound, owing to the fact that none of the yards are equipped with dry docks of sufficient size; and when we compare our facilities in this line with those of the other great powers, it clearly shows how negligent we have been in the past concerning their construction and enforces the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy on this matter.

The following table shows the number of dry docks of some of the great maritime powers:

Memorandum showing number of government dry docks owned by principal maritime powers.

Country.	Dry docks.	Floating.	Building.
France	32	----	----
Colonies	3	----	----
Germany	8	4	----
Great Britain	40	----	----
Colonies	20	1	3
Italy	11	3	----
Japan	6	----	----
Russia	8	4	----
United States	10	2	5

And when we remember that out of that 12 accredited to us many of them were constructed years ago and are only adequate for the docking of our small vessels, and that we only have two of proper size and requirements for our large vessels, our weakness in that line is clearly shown.

B. S. = Battle ships, i. e., vessels usually of large tonnage (the present practice giving between 10,500 and 15,000 tons), with maximum offense and defense; protection to hull by vertical side armor; protective deck; coal bunkers and cellulose; guns protected by barbettes, turrets, casemates, and shields.

Ar. Cr. = Armored cruisers, i. e., vessels of moderate to large tonnage, with protection to hull and battery similar to that of battle ships, except that the thickness of metal in all cases is much less, which with the weight saved by carrying lighter guns gives opportunity to make the speed and steaming radius of the armored cruiser much greater than the battle ship.

Pr. Cr. = Protected cruisers, i. e., vessels usually of small to moderate tonnage, with protection to hull by protective deck, coal bunkers, and cellulose. No side armor. No turrets or barbettes or casemates; guns protected by gun shields.

Unpr. Cr. = Unprotected cruisers, i. e., vessels without any of the protection of the above classes. It will be noticed that no country has constructed a vessel of this class for many years.

C. D. = Coast defense, i. e., vessels with many of the characteristics of B. S., in having thick armor for hull and battery protection; large guns; small speed; limited coal supply, which means small steaming radius. Usually these vessels have low free-board and are not good seagoing vessels.

Especial attention is invited to the fact that no country, except the United States and Russia, has constructed such a vessel for many years. This point is regarded as very important in estimating the naval strength of the several powers.

The expression "coast defense" as applied to ships is almost unknown abroad. It appears in the United States in the construction of the monitor class and in France in the furor with which the construction of submarine boats is undertaken.

A study of the policy of the real maritime nations—England and Germany—shows that the defense is always to be offense. Both these countries are building only seagoing battle ships, large cruisers, and all torpedo boat construction has been abandoned for the construction of torpedo boat destroyers.

Torp. Ves.=Torpedo vessels, a class 700 to 1,000 tons, which experience has shown to have neither the merits of gunboats nor of sufficient speed to catch torpedo boats; and therefore construction of this class has ceased.

T. B. D.=Torpedo-boat destroyers, vessels of 200 to 400 tons, strong construction, good seagoing qualities, very high speed, and large steaming radius.

T. B.=Torpedo boats, vessels from 30 to 200 tons, no longer being built in England or Germany, which, as above stated, are building only the destroyer.

The data which follow are taken from a British Parliamentary paper entitled "Return 'showing the fleets of Great Britain, France, Russia, Germany, Italy, United States of America, and Japan, distinguishing: Battle ships, built and building; cruisers, built and building; coast-defense vessels, built and building; torpedo vessels, torpedo-boat destroyers, and torpedo boats, built and building,'" which, as therein stated, is compiled from the official list of each navy, and have been supplemented by some fuller and later data on hand in the Office of Naval Intelligence (United States). It is therefore correct.

It must be clearly borne in mind that there are in every navy certain classes of vessels which appear in the official navy list, but which can not be considered as forming part of that navy's fighting force.

These are (a) obsolete ships; (b) receiving ships; (c) sailing and training ships, brigs, etc.; (d) tugs and miscellaneous.

All these classes are omitted from the tonnage given below.

Neither are there included in this data any auxiliary vessels, such as yachts or merchant vessels, for it would mean, practically, the addition of the merchant marine of the several countries, all of which is available.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty minutes.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, it is with great pleasure that I rise to give my support to this bill, this liberal provision coming from the Naval Affairs Committee, and for the support of what is still better, the enlargement of our Navy. In my judgment, with the exception of the bill to regulate the currency of our country, recently passed by this Congress, this is the most important legislation that has come before this House for consideration.

As the currency bill provided greater facilities for our trade and business at home, and put our money on such a sound basis that we can with safety enlarge our commerce and trade abroad, so, in another sphere of government, does this bill, by affording protection, by the defense of our gallant Navy, for our entire domestic coast on the east and the west of our country, take care of us in that direction, by furnishing us with sufficient force so that our business interests, national prestige, commerce, and ships, wherever they may float and wander in the development of our commerce, will enjoy the protection which the complicated conditions that now prevail throughout this world of ours necessitates shall be furnished by every government to protect its commercial interests.

There is another phase of this branch of our Government which I wish to touch upon in support of this bill, not the political standard, but simply as a national and economic question which must come into the control of all governments if they would survive and hold their own against the competition of the world.

Who would have thought three years ago—and there is no such good teacher as experience, and nothing so well to profit by as the phases of history through which we have just passed—who would have considered, if it had been urged in this House, that the Navy should be enlarged, and of breaking away from that old, time-honored advice of the Father of our Country to avoid entangling alliances.

We then felt ourselves safe from foreign invasion and that there could not be any matters of vital importance that would necessitate our country getting into conflict with a foreign power; and yet in a few short months after that naval bill had passed this House we found ourselves engaged in a war with one of the first powers of Europe, who thought she had a first-class navy, and so great was our fear that the people on our coast were calling on the Government to protect them from invasion of the new Spanish Armada making its way across the Atlantic and threatening our ports of entry and commerce.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, in a few short months after the passage of that bill our ports were so threatened and in danger of the foreign enemy. This should be a lesson to the people of our country that in time of comparative tranquillity and peaceful outlook we should take these steps looking ahead which will make the people of our country feel secure, and that they are not in danger of invasion from any foreign force whatever.

Now that the war is over and peace, thank God, again prevails over our nation and that of our recent enemy, responsibilities have come, and, in my judgment, they have come to stay, and have got to be met and provided for.

Not only must our new possessions be protected from any foreign invasion, not only must their commercial development be provided for, but we have taken our place among the nations of the earth, have assumed responsibilities which, I fear, will lead to further complications, for we can not enter the competition of trade in the Far East without clashing with the European countries and being obliged to provide safety for our commerce there.

Nay, more, to show how events lead from one stage to another, already our State Department has concluded negotiations to insure our full entry into the trade of China, which, in my judgment, far outstrips and outvalues any of the points of progress we have made so far.

You talk of the influence of the 8,000,000 people of the Philippine Islands in developing our trade. Are they to be mentioned alongside of the 400,000,000 people sufficiently civilized to consume our products, our railroad supplies, our electrical inventions, and everything for which our people are so famous and in the supply of which they are now commanding the markets of the world?

Do not think for one instant that Europe has yielded that sphere to which she was devoting herself, technically known as the sphere of influence. Do not think, my colleagues, that Europe has granted that willingly or without some mental reservation. The European nations had their eye on the trade of China long before recent events ever opened that door, long before the Japanese war made it possible to carve up that ancient Empire. Europe seeks everywhere to develop her trade; and it will be necessary for our country to guard our treaty rights and insist that they shall be preserved and maintained in that country.

It is for this reason that this bill is so wisely drawn in looking to the future, in adding to our effective force; for the future depends, so far as our country is concerned, almost entirely upon our Navy. It would be almost impossible for any foreign country to attack us here on this continent with our 70,000,000 people. They could not effect a landing; and if they did, they would be overwhelmed by numbers.

The same reasons would prevent our invasion of any foreign country far distant. Therefore the battles and the struggles are to be on the sea. We must be ready. I do not contend that we must have a navy to outstrip the world; but I do contend that we should have a navy of such ample force that we can hold our own against any single nation and be able to maintain our rights against any comer.

There is another point in relation to our foreign development. We have heard a great deal of argument in this Chamber lately upon the question whether the Constitution follows the flag. Be that as it may, I wish to lay down the proposition that commerce follows the Navy. Wherever the American flag is carried on our ships you will find that the merchantman will follow on his more peaceful errand. Such has been the experience of all the countries of Europe.

Let our citizens know that their goings and comings on the high seas will be protected; let our merchants and our traders know that wherever they may trade or do business their rights will be maintained, and you will find that the enterprise and "push" of the citizens of our great Republic will carry out the rest of the development by the extension of our commerce. Therefore it is essentially necessary, in view of the great area that has been added to our country and the increased opening for the development of our trade, that our Navy should be large enough to cover it and protect it in every quarter of the world, so that no detriment may come to the enterprise of the American citizen who seeks to develop our commercial and manufacturing welfare.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if you pick up the trade reports of to-day, you will find that our commerce abroad amounts to $1,000,000,000. More than that, we find that the ratio of the export of manufactured goods is far outstripping that of our cereals. Up to within ten years ago the prosperity of our country rose and fell with the condition of the crops.

Every man assumed that the success of our country depended upon the crop conditions. But that will not be so to the same extent now. Should the crops fail, we shall still have our exports of manufactures. Even coal is coming to be an article of export. Europe and South America are now demanding large quantities of our coal. We must protect this branch of our trade as well as any other.

And it is not only in time of war that our commerce must be protected. Why, sir, recently, when neutral goods were being transported to South Africa, even a friendly nation, carried away by her energy to conduct her own war, interfered with our commerce. It is not only in times of war, but sometimes in times of peace, that the Navy has to protect our commerce as it goes.

Some time ago, in the harbor of Rio de Janeiro, during a time of entire peace, our ships from Baltimore, laden with wheat, were not allowed to land on the quays of Rio de Janeiro. The navies of the entire world, represented by their ships in that magnificent harbor, did not lift a finger to break the blockade. And why? Because their sympathies were entirely with the monarchy. And it was not until that good admiral of ours, Benham, gave the order to Captain Bronson, on the Detroit, to clear his ship for action that the agricultural products of our country led the way up to the walls of Rio de Janeiro, and cargoes of flour from Baltimore were allowed to be landed.

I only cite this case, Mr. Chairman, to show that the Navy is just as useful in time of peace and for the benefit of the farmer and for any other development of our activities or any other branch of business at any other period in our national history.

There has been very much discussion here in regard to the methods by which the Navy should be developed, on the question whether ships should be built in our own yards, on the question of the Government owning its own armor-plate factory, and also whether it is desirable that this Government should proceed to buy its armor by contract with private parties.

I will leave that phase of the question to the various members of the committee and to this House, who are better informed to decide upon it than I am. But there is one thing that I wish to urge, and that is the avoidance of delay. Three years ago, on a similar debate, you in this Chamber adopted a ridiculous proposition which was ingrafted upon an appropriation bill, providing that the cost of armor plate was not to exceed $300 a ton.

The people that did it and the House that passed it ought to have known that that would simply block the completion of the construction of these men-of-war. That was, Mr. Chairman, a fearful responsibility for gentlemen to assume and for the House to assume and to act upon, for on the breaking out of our war with Spain, owing to that ridiculous condition in the appropriation bill, two of the great battle ships of the nation were not completed and did not form a part of our Navy. I believe as firmly as that I am standing here that if the addition of these two battle ships at that time had been made Spain might have hesitated to go to war with this country.

Even on paper, as the two navies were supposed to exist at that time, Spain thought she had a slight advantage over the Navy of the United States, and that was doubtless the reason that induced her to take up the cudgels of war. Had these two ships been finished and in actual existence at that time, I doubt very much if this war would have taken place.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question just at that point?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. You say that the reason why we had this war was because we had not got armor put on our ships?

Mr. ADAMS. No; I did not say that.

Mr. GAINES. Then, if I understand the gentleman's argument, the war was caused by the fact that these armor-plate companies "held up" the Government and refused to supply armor plate at the price fixed by the law, so that the Government could not finish the ships, and the Government could not manufacture it itself?

Mr. ADAMS. If the gentleman from Tennessee is undertaking to quote me, he must quote me correctly. I said nothing of the kind. I never said the cause of the war was the fact that these two ships had not been completed. I only suggested that if we had had these ships in our Navy at that time Spain would probably have hesitated before going to war with us.

Mr. GAINES. Now, in order to avoid that trouble in the future we want to erect an armor-plate factory that will take us out of this monopoly.

Mr. ADAMS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I prefer to proceed in my own way; but the gentleman from Tennessee has suggested that the Government was held up. Now, who "held up" the Government in this matter?

Mr. GAINES. Carnegie and the Bethlehem Company, I will say in response to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMS. Who held up the Government? I will answer the gentleman. The gentlemen who put that ridiculous proposition in the naval appropriation bill to which I have referred. They were the ones.

Mr. GAINES. And now the gentleman wants to pay $545 a ton for the whole thing, when the original proposition was about $400.

Mr. ADAMS. I repeat that the gentlemen who held up the Government were those who voted for the ridiculous proposition of naming the price that the Democratic Secretary of the Navy who investigated it, and a committee of experts appointed by the Navy investigated, and which was investigated by the Naval Committee itself of this House, giving their best judgment to it—the combined opinion of all three of them being that $400 a ton was a fair price.

And in spite of that, gentlemen like the gentleman from Tennessee insisted on putting in that ridiculous proposition; and I charge you now with the responsibility; and the United States Government was weakened to the extent of two battle ships for the Spanish war by this absurd action on the part of the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said, I did not mean to go into a discussion of a technical point involved here, but certain facts were so apparent and the history of the action of the House so well known that I am surprised that even so astute a gentleman as the gentleman from Tennessee would rake up such an issue that has been settled so long ago.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ADAMS. No; I decline to yield further.

And, Mr. Chairman, look at the result of this legislation. Instead of getting the armor at $400 a ton, which we could have gotten then, the Naval Committee now adopts the price of $125 a ton higher for armor, which some gentlemen on that side contend is no better than the old harveyized armor which was in use at the time the price was fixed.

Now, in conclusion, I simply wish to say that I have the honor to represent a district in the development of this Navy, and whether it be in the navy-yards of the United States or the private shipbuilding yards on that Clyde of America, the Delaware River, we stand ready not only by our support of the Naval Committee in Congress, but by the strong arm of our mechanics and by the genius of our shipbuilders, and the loyalty of the people of that district, to help develop the American Navy, so that come what may, in glorious peace or terrible war, we will give that support to the Government which loyal Pennsylvania and loyal Philadelphia has always been ready to give, whether in the construction of ships, the manning of them by our loyal citizens, or pecuniary and patriotic support.

You will always find the district which I have the honor to represent ready to support the Government in the development of the Navy; and it stands to-day ready to be at its country's call to take its place wherever it can be of the best service to the interests of all the people.

I yield the remainder of the time allotted to me to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] is recognized.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HOPKINS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 4190. An act to provide for the removal to the proper district for trial of persons indicted for offenses against the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1906) granting an increase of pension to Agnes K. Capron, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. SHOUP, and Mr. LINDSAY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1905) granting an increase of pension to Lillian Capron, had asked a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. SHOUP, and Mr. LINDSAY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2942) granting an increase of pension to William Padgett.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, on the 27th of May, 1898, the Spanish Government sent Admiral Camara elaborate instructions as to the movements of his squadron, from which I quote the following:

The first division under the command of your excellency will shape its course for the Bermudas, and at a proper distance from those islands you will detach a fast vessel to acquire at Hamilton all possible information, besides such as the Government will communicate to you through our consul, José García Acuña, a resident of said port, as to the location, number, and quality of the hostile forces distributed along the Atlantic coast, it being understood that the communication with the Bermudas must be confined to the one vessel referred to and only for a length of time absolutely necessary for the purpose indicated, the rest of the division to pass out of sight of the islands, so that its presence in said waters may not become known.

Taking into account the information you may acquire, and eluding an encounter with superior forces, your excellency will choose such point on the United States coasts as you may deem best adapted—Charleston, if possible—to carry out in the direction from south to north a series of hostile acts, in the energy of which you will be guided by circumstances, against fortified positions as well as against such places as, owing to their industrial, military, or commercial importance, will justify the operation and make it worth while. I call your excellency's attention to the expediency of your course along the coast being from south to north, as indicated. Key West being the enemy's principal base of operations, the forces detached to oppose your operations will follow you instead of going to meet you, as would otherwise be the case.

Your excellency will determine to what point the hostilities should be carried, remembering that the object of these hostilities is not only to make reprisals for the enemy's unjustified acts on our own coasts, but principally to call his attention toward the north, dividing his forces and thus facilitating the movements of the third division and at the same time those of Admiral Cervera's squadron. You might find it expedient (but this is not imposed upon you as a duty) to go up north as far as to permit you to detach a cruiser to Halifax, in order that Lieut. Ramón Carranza, who is assigned to Canada, may give you such information as he may have acquired beforehand. Having accomplished on the United States coasts the object indicated, and following the route which offers the greatest security, you will try, unless reasons of greater importance should prevent, to pass north of the island of Mariguana, or Turks Island, and collect at the latter the information which the Government will take care to forward to you there.

We were only saved from this attack, it seems, by the condition of affairs in the Philippines, which made it necessary that Camara's fleet should be ordered there.

While, from the weakness of Spain and the utter unfitness of her ships to wage successful war, although, at that time, many of our important harbors were unfortified, it may be said there was no real danger to be apprehended from the attack, yet the incident should direct our attention to what would have been our situation in case we were at war with one of the great powers of the world, having a navy superior to ours. With such an enemy concentrating a superior fleet on our coast and with many of our ships compelled to assist in defending our different harbors along our Atlantic coast, how would it be possible for us to get reenforcements to the point attacked? Fortunately nature has, in great part, provided us a means for accomplishing this, so far, at least, as torpedo boats and other light craft are concerned. I refer to the wonderful system of inland waterways along our Atlantic coast.

It is now eighty-one years since Mr. Calhoun, as Secretary of War under Mr. Monroe's Administration, called attention to this most important element in our defense. In an elaborate report made on 14th January, 1819, to the House of Representatives, in response to a resolution instructing the Secretary of War to report "a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress for the purpose of opening and constructing such roads and canals as may deserve and require the aid of Government, with a view to military operation in time of war, the transportation of munitions of war," etc., referring to the Atlantic coast of about 2,100 miles in extent, Mr. Calhoun said:

Against a line so long, so weak, so exposed, and presenting such strong motives for depredations, hostilities the most harassing and exhausting may be carried on by a naval power; and should the subjugation of the country ever be attempted, it is probable that against this frontier, facing Europe—the seat of the great powers of the world—the principal efforts would be turned. Thus circumstanced, it is the duty of the Government to render it as secure as possible.

Further on Mr. Calhoun said:

No object of the kind is more important, and there is none to which State or individual capacity is more inadequate. It must be perfected by the General Government or not be perfected at all, at least for many years. No one or two States have a sufficient interest. It is immediately beneficial to more than half the States of the Union, and without the aid of the General Government would require their cooperation. It is at all times a most important object to the nation, and in a war with a naval power is almost indispensable to our military, commercial, and financial operations. It may in a single view be considered the great artery of the country, and when the coasting trade is suspended by war the vast intercourse between the North and South, which requires annually 500,000 tons of shipping, and which is necessary to the commerce, the agriculture, and manufactures of more than half of the Union, seeks this channel of communication.

After describing the wonderful resources of our country in glowing terms, a country "almost a world in itself," Mr. Calhoun said:

But, dropping this more elevated view and considering the subject only as it regards "military operations in time of war, and the transportation of the munitions of war," what could contribute so much as this communication to the effectual and cheap defense of our Atlantic frontier? Take the line of inland navigation along the coast, the whole of which, it is estimated, could be completed for sea vessels by digging 100 miles, and at the expense of $3,000,000, the advantage which an enemy with a naval force now has, by rapidly moving along the coast and harassing and exhausting the country, would be in a great measure lost to him. In fact, the capacity for rapid and prompt movements and concentration would be to the full as much in our power. We would have in most of the points of attack a shorter line to move over, in order to concentrate our means; and, aided by steamboats, would have the capacity to pass it in a shorter time and with greater certainty than an enemy, even with a naval superiority, would have to attack us.

After treating of the Canadian frontier and that of the Gulf of Mexico, Mr. Calhoun further said:

Many of the roads and canals which have been suggested are no doubt of the first importance to the commerce, the manufactures, the agriculture, and the political prosperity of the country, but are not, for that reason, less useful or necessary for military purposes. It is, in fact, one of the great advantages of our country, enjoying so many others, that whether we regard its internal improvements in relation to military, civil, or political purposes, very nearly the same system, in all its parts, is required. The road or canal can scarcely be designated, which is highly useful for military operations, that is not equally required for the industry or political prosperity of the community. If those roads or canals had been pointed out which are necessary for military purposes only, the list would have been small indeed. I have, therefore, presented all, without regard to the fact that they might be employed for other uses, which, in the event of war, would be necessary to give economy, certainty, and success to our military operations, and which, if they had been completed before the late war, would by their savings in that single contest in men, money, and reputation have more than indemnified the country for the expense of their construction.

Eighty-one years have passed and but little has ever been done by the General Government toward carrying out Mr. Calhoun's recommendations. To be sure, many of the water courses forming a part of this inland route have been improved under river and harbor work, but no concerted effort to perfect the route as a military measure has been made.

What is to-day the condition of this route?

Upon data furnished me by the Coast and Geodetic Survey I find that starting at New York and going south there is a clear passage through for about 5 feet draft to Beaufort, N. C., by the following route: Outside of Staten Island, then through the Raritan River, then by the Delaware and Raritan Canal, then down Delaware River and through Delaware and Chesapeake Canal to Chesapeake Bay, then to Hampton Roads, up Elizabeth River, through Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal, Currituck Sound, North River, Albemarle, Pamlico, and Cove sounds to Beaufort, N. C. From Beaufort, N. C., there is a waterway a foot or two deep to New River Inlet, and thence to within some 2 miles of Cape Fear River there is a "drain of water." At this point comes the first obstruction of land, there being no water connection between the tributaries of Cape Fear River and the rivers flowing into Winyah Bay, South Carolina.

From Winyah Bay to Charleston there is a waterway, but only for boats of very light draft. It is necessary, therefore, that a vessel should go outside from Beaufort, N. C., to Charleston. From Charleston to Savannah there is a route for passenger steamers running by Beaufort, S. C., and the Port Royal Naval Station. From Savannah to Fernandina there is a clear passage, though shallow in places, and from Fernandina to St. Johns River there is a passage for boats of very light draft only. There is a waterway up the St. Johns River to New Head, but the upper part is much choked by vegetation. Here is another obstruction of land of 3 miles between the St. Johns and Indian River. From Mosquito Inlet through Indian River and other waters there is a clear passage through to Key West. It thus appears that from New York to Key West there are but three gaps in the water connection (without regard to depth), the first at Cape Fear River, the second between Cape Fear River and Winyah Bay, South Carolina, and the third between the St. Johns River and Indian River.

Since Mr. Calhoun's report the following canals, now a part of the route, have been built: Delaware and Raritan Canal, built in 1833 at a cost of $3,707,916; Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, built in 1824–1829 at a cost of $2,250,000 (one-fifth of this amount was contributed by the United States, Pennsylvania contributed $100,000, Maryland $50,000, Delaware $25,000, and the remainder was contributed by citizens of the three States); Chesapeake and Albemarle Canal, built 1856–1859 by a corporation.

Mr. Chairman, under the present overwhelming importance of torpedo boats in naval warfare, especially for harbor defense, the perfection of this inland waterway has become more than ever important. The following letter from the Secretary of the Navy gives the latest information on the subject:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 15, 1900.

SIR: The Department received your letter of the 2d instant in which you state that the River and Harbor Committee will consider at this session several projects along the seacoast of South Carolina which are intended to improve the inland navigation through that State as a part of the inland navigation along the Atlantic coast, and requesting, if during the war with Spain the importance of this inland navigation was brought to the Department's attention or if any facts bearing thereon were collected by it, that you be furnished with the same for use before the committee.

The chief naval intelligence officer, Capt. C. D. Sigsbee, United States Navy, to whom your letter was also referred, reports as follows:

"The strategic importance of an interior system of waterways along the Atlantic coast line has long been recognized as very great. If perfected, this means of interior communication would permit of rapid concentration of a torpedo flotilla at strategic points, without regard to the state of weather or the possible presence of a hostile force on the coast.

"In 1895 the U. S. torpedo boat Cushing passed through the inland waters of South Carolina from Charleston on her way to Savannah. Lieut. Commander (then lieutenant) F. F. Fletcher, United States Navy, in command of the Cushing, stated as follows: 'At several points on the route between Charleston, S. C., and Jacksonville, Fla., channels have been dredged so as to maintain the route intact. Additional improvements in this direction would considerably shorten the total distance and render the route practicable for comparatively large vessels.'

"In the latter part of 1897 several United States torpedo boats investigated the interior passages of the southern Atlantic coast, demonstrating their great possibility of usefulness.

"With regard to the South Carolina coast, the claim has been made that a comparatively small amount of dredging would enable torpedo boats to utilize the inside passages and to sally forth in such a way as to make it necessary for an enemy to cover some 35 miles of coast in operating against Charleston.

"It may be noted, however, that the dredging and opening up of these inside passages for commercial purposes may not in all cases fully meet strategic needs. To find and develop the best inside route from port to port does not necessarily make available the best means of reaching a good sallying outlet."

The above information, it is thought, fully answers the inquiries contained in your letter.

Very respectfully, JNO. D. LONG, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM ELLIOTT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Chairman, during my service in the House I have devoted myself especially to the improvement of the rivers and harbors of South Carolina, believing that more could be done by me in that way than in any other toward the upbuilding of the business interests of my people and the development of new lines of industry. In the last river and harbor act surveys and reports were ordered on several projects in my district, the adoption of which will almost wholly perfect this inland water route so far as the South Carolina coast is concerned. The report of Maj. E. H. Ruffner, United States engineer, on one of the projects is so valuable and instructive on the very line we are discussing, and displays such a deep interest in the welfare of the people whom I have the honor to represent, I feel that I can not do better than insert it in full:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Charleston, S. C., December 16, 1899.

GENERAL: I inclose herewith report of Assistant Engineer Reid Whitford of a survey of "the waterways and low-lying marsh lands or rice lands between the North and South Santee rivers, with a view to extending the Estherville-Minim Creek Canal in a southerly direction to Alligator River," to comply with the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899.

This report is clear and specific, and covers all that is necessary to know when the particular survey across the particular region alone is to be discussed. But to do justice to the subject, and to the region, to the possibilities of the future, to the ideas of the many who are annually bringing up in different river and harbor bills different items of the same general subject—water communication along the low-lying coast region of the Atlantic States—something more is needed, and I propose to explain why this item is to be considered in connection not only with four other distinct items upon which I render reports under this bill, but in connection with items for which Congress makes appropriations from time to time. Moreover the whole subject crops up from time to time in similar reports by others on different items, some of which were adopted, and on which money was appropriated formerly, but in every case Congress has preferred to consider the item separately and not as a logical whole.

I think it will be seen that all that is written here and in my other kindred reports properly form one subject.

Doubtless this thought was in the mind of more than one in the past, for when these surveys were ordered their wording shows a connection between them and existing projects and a remembrance of past efforts to secure the adoption of a general project for the inland navigation of this region.

It is well known that the coast of the Netherlands and East Friesland, from the Western Schelde to the mouth of the Elbe, a distance of some 378 miles, finds a region similar in general conditions in our South Atlantic coast from Chesapeake Bay to Florida. The same low fringe of sandy islands front the Atlantic on the North Carolina coast as is found on the North Sea coast. The sounds may represent the Zuyder Zee in character, and not far different in size. The maze of large and small islands, with intersecting water canals in every direction, that are on the South Carolina and Georgia ocean front finds its counterpart in Holland.

Annually thousands of our countrymen, after having read the glowing pages of Motley, and steeped with the knowledge of Dutch, of Pilgrims, and of historical struggle for civil and religious freedom that those shores will renew to them, ride and sail over railroad and canal and admire the indomitable courage of its inhabitants, their patience and skill, and the wonderful results of their energy. But if a comparison be made of this bleak coast fronting the angry waves of the almost constantly boisterous North Sea with our Southern coast, only occasionally swept by the cyclone or Southern storm; of the cold winter expanse, with canal and field locked up for months, and our islands bathed in sunshine, except for a few flitting cold waves; of the ponderous, massy sand dams fronting the ever-watchful sea, and our own open islands and coasts, as yet unchanged in their natural aspects, there will be given much food for thought. We may go in spring to Holland and admire the wealth of tulips blooming in a chill soil, as the result of centuries of nursing and care, and we will probably never think of the swamps and islands of our Southern coast, riotous with vegetable life. It is a matter of pleasure to see what man has done in the tempestuous, inhospitable, and dangerous regions of the north, and it must be a matter of national pride to think there are possibilities on our Southern coast that only a small fraction of the labor given elsewhere will receive manifold rewards here.

In swamps rich with pine and cypress, juniper and oak; on islands that carry their fringe of oak to the very edge of the ocean; in marshes carpeted with sedge and reed, the home of bird and of fish alike; everywhere is a soil rich and ready to yield something of value to man. Wherever the soil is supplied with more than bare sand a growth of some kind is ever ready to spring, and even from the apparently pure sand there will start vigorous, stout binding grass ready to add its share to the coming garden spot. Along this entire belt of watered, island, marsh, swamp, lowlands the same general conditions obtain, and from Virginia to Florida lies a land with its future before it, when the central lands are crowded, and man must seek more room for the coming millions. If Holland can support 4,500,000 on 12,680 square miles, surely the "sea islands" can some day support four times that number.

And yet to-day the coast counties of South Carolina have a population not exceeding 200,000. This coast is, of course, not easily accessible to railways, and therefore the entire water front of South Carolina is touched only in three points; and no road does or could, at a profitable cost, run parallel to the coast, as does the railroad from New York to New Haven, for example.

For many years the United States has, in a desultory way, been rendering some assistance to intercommunications in this region by spending small sums on certain rivers, which would, if amply navigable, serve for all needs of commerce. But as a rule the lumber and cotton, the "truck" and oysters, the fish and rice go from farm and hamlet to market in small sailing vessels, from the size of a rowboat to that of a schooner of less than a hundred tons. Going with the tide and using the wind when fair, these craft dot the numberless waterways in every direction, and their number and what they carry are no easier to count than are the wagons that pass over the country roads of any farming region. The waterways of the coast are the roads of the interior; the boats are the wagons.

There have been given me for report five different items of surveys of different portions of this maze of waterways of the South Carolina coast, and I have selected this one link to make these remarks, since they apply to all. It is and would be difficult to consider one bit apart from all. The United States has for many years been spending millions in rebuilding and extending the system of levees on the Mississippi River. It would have been impossible to consider one bit of levee without reference to the whole, and the former patchworks system has been extended from plantation to county, to State, to the valley. So we must in time consider this South Carolina coast; first as a system of canals for the whole, and later on for agricultural purposes, when dams or levees will inclose large islands, and we shall have a large area raising every agricultural product and as accessible in every way as are the Holland villages and hamlets.

From time to time individual engineer officers have reported favorably upon different points and lines of "the inland water route," mainly for military purposes. I know of no reason why we might not as well look forward into the future of the South Carolina coast as an improved Holland as we have for many years been improving the Mississippi River bottom for the teeming millions in the womb of Time!

The improvement of the entrance to Winyah Bay is almost at hand, and the many, many miles of water courses emptying into that broad haven may use this exit as freely as the delta of the Rhine uses the Holland ports. Lynchs Creek is but a small part of all this. Why should it not be dealt with as a part of a whole? The Pedees, Waccamaw, Black River, and the Santee form a great basin all mutually contributary to the one exit; but the coast country is to be bound together in a different way. Its coast channels connect the various threads, and the links that we make all work to an end common to all and for the benefit of all.

The Estherville-Minim Creek Canal connects Santee River and Winyah Bay, and is an important element in coastwise trade. The two Santees are parallel, and the shortest line connecting them, and suitable for the same end, is that which is reported upon in this special report. Several lines have been examined and two selected. Either will do; the link is necessary and must be somewhere near where the surveys run; but if a general view is had of the whole matter a general plan will be adopted of working this interior water line or lines up with a general fund and a comprehensive plan; one that will set aside a certain sum for each year's dredging, to be used with the view of working toward the close and easy communication of all outlying districts, with adjacent ports on either hand, and the whole to be gradually improved in depth and later on in width.

The Sampit River survey belongs to the port of Georgetown; the Wee Tee Lake, Williamsburg County, is a part of Santee River district; Lynchs River is a branch of Great Pedee; across from North to South Santee is a link in the general up-and-down coast connection, and Charleston Harbor to Alligator River is the main line between Charleston and Georgetown. All of these should be reported together, and these and the whole coast line should form a part of an intelligent, comprehensive improvement of waterways and afterwards of the agricultural region itself as a whole.

Merely as an item to show that this coastwise commerce is not a fiction, I will mention that it is a matter of record that the bridge recently built across "Wappoo Cut," a part of the "inland route," near Charleston, actually held the draw open for 4,694 different craft between March 11 and November 30, 1899—two hundred and sixty-four days, or an average of about 18 per day. Of course this does not include craft that can pass the bridge without opening the draw. The routes reported upon by me this year are—

From Charleston to Alligator River, estimate	$281,000
North to South Santee	84,000
Maintenance Estherville-Minim Creek Canal, regular bill	20,000
Winyah Bay, ocean vessels, Waccamaw River, regular bill	3,000
Total	388,000

These sums would, if furnished, provide for a gradual improvement of the entire route from Charleston to North Carolina, and certainly no better use could be made of that amount of money than to provide a good line of water communication along this length of coast. To make the matter complete the idea should be extended so that from Charleston to Savannah on the south certain well-known and formerly reported upon improvements should be entered into as a part of this general whole, under a general plan and a general appropriation.

Very respectfully,

E. H. RUFFNER,
Major of Engineers.

Brig. Gen. JOHN M. WILSON,
Chief of Engineers, U. S. A.
(Through the Division Engineer.)

Mr. Chairman, when an officer of our distinguished Corps of Engineers "not to the manner born," having only a cold, official duty to perform, feels constrained to put forth such an enthusiastic and yet solid indorsement of these projects, let us hope that the River and Harbor Committee at the next session will determine to perfect, as far as possible, this inland water route, both to the advancement of commerce and agriculture and as an excellent means of defense in time of war. One other very much needed improvement is to make a cut through Fenwicks Island between Charleston and Beaufort, S. C., a project heretofore reported and now pending before the committee. The section of country specially affected by these improvements is that which produces in great abundance the finest rice in the world, sea-island cotton that to-day sells at 50 cents a pound, and is making great strides in growing early vegetables, to which last industry rapid and unobstructed transportation is so important.

Nowhere, Mr. Chairman, has river and harbor work been more successful than in South Carolina. The jetty system at Charleston has increased the depth of water on that bar from 16 to 25 feet at high water, while a new and inexpensive project, which will increase the depth to 26 feet at low water, has now been provided for. At Winyah Bay the engineers report that so successful has been the work thus far that the project, which was calculated to produce only 15 feet of water, will produce 23 feet. Already we are feeling the impulse given our trade by these improved avenues of commerce and are striving manfully to meet the new conditions that are upon us.

To leave the seacoast and go to the interior of the State for a moment, we there find a most extraordinary industrial development. Within the course of a very few years South Carolina, from being an almost purely agricultural State, has become one of the foremost in cotton manufacturing. She is now third from the front, and with the end of this year will have passed Rhode Island and be next to Massachusetts. The rivalry between Massachusetts and South Carolina has been the theme of many a discourse, but the wildest imagination never suggested that to the other elements of their striving that of industrial development would be added. Sixty days ago there were being built in South Carolina mills that will contain 450,000 spindles and costing about $6,000,000. Of 77 mills projected in the United States for the quarter ending March 31 last she leads the column with 23.

In order that the country may see what deep water, diversified agriculture, rapid transportation, and cotton mills are doing for us, Charleston, speaking for the State, will invite the splendid constituencies whom you gentlemen represent to attend the South Carolina Interstate and West Indian Exposition to be held at Charleston in the closing days of the first year of the new century. That old city, that has fought more fights and won more battles than any city in the land; that has been desolated by fire, torn by shot and shell, wracked by earthquake, and ravaged by tempest, is equipping herself for her new career, and asks all her friends to come and bid her Godspeed. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, it is with some regret that I have found myself unable to agree with the distinguished gentleman [Mr. FOSS] who, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, has presided with so much patience, tact, and ability over the deliberations of that committee, and also that I differ in some matters connected with this bill with the senior member of the minority [Mr. CUMMINGS], whom we all esteem so highly and whom it is our pleasure so often to follow on naval matters.

But it remained for the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] to undertake to lecture the members of the minority of that committee who thought proper to sign the minority report, and to lecture the House, telling the members that they were uneducated, that all wisdom, in effect, centered in himself, because for the past five years he had given consideration to this subject, and called upon the members of the House to listen to the words of wisdom as they fell from his lips.

When I heard the gentleman discoursing in this manner, I was reminded of what Job said to his false friends:

No doubt but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you.

[Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished acting chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. FOSS] on yesterday referred to the fact that this bill carried over $61,000,000, and explained it in part by stating that it was a bill for peace. I take it, then, that if it carried $150,000,000 it would be a bill for more peace.

I append herewith a table, taken from the report of the majority of the committee, showing the amounts carried by the naval appropriation bills commencing with 1883, at which time our so-called policy of a new Navy commenced:

Amounts carried by the naval appropriation bills since 1883.

	Appropriation.
1883	$14,819,976.80
1884	15,804,434.23
1885	14,980,472.59
1886	15,070,837.95
1887	16,489,907.20
1888	25,767,348.19
1889	19,942,835.35
1890	21,092,510.27
1891	24,136,035.53
1892	32,541,654.78
1893	23,543,395.00
1894	22,104,061.38
1895	25,327,126.72
1896	29,416,245.31
1897	30,562,660.95
1898	33,003,234.19
1900	48,099,969.58

From this table it will be seen that commencing with less than $15,000,000 in 1883 we have now come to a bill in time of peace of over $61,000,000, and the end is not yet, because, so far as I am informed, no intimation has come from the majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs that we can hope in the near future for any reduction in the amount carried in the annual appropriation bill. The Navy is not now engaged in any war. Even the soldiers which are transported to and from the Philippine Islands are carried in the transports furnished by the War Department, and the bodies of the marines who die abroad are brought home in war transports.

There is no proper justification for this immense appropriation bill, but it is a part of the general policy of expansion in expenditures for the purpose of creating fictitious prosperity.

As an example of what I regard as unwise legislation, I cite the case of the navy-yard at Portsmouth, N. H. This navy-yard is only some 50 miles from Boston, where there is a good harbor and first-class yard.

When Secretary Whitney was at the head of the Navy Department, he closed the navy-yards at both Boston and Portsmouth as unnecessary. Both these yards have not only been opened, but stone or concrete dry docks, to cost over $1,000,000 each, contracted for and the whole organization for a great navy-yard provided for each place.

I am disposed to think that a navy-yard should be maintained at Boston. But I am informed that the location at Portsmouth, N. H., is utterly unfitted for such purpose. Without it we have enough now upon the Atlantic coast. Others may be needed upon the Pacific.

In connection with this navy-yard we find in this bill—

Bureau of Ordnance, civil establishment, 1 writer	$1,000.00
Bureau of Equipment, civil establishment, 1 clerk	1,000.00
Bureau of Yards and Docks, civil establishment	5,885.00
Bureau of Yards and Docks, public works	361,000.00
Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, civil establishment	5,840.00
Bureau of Construction and Repair, construction plant	25,000.00
Bureau of Construction and Repair, civil establishment	3,434.50
Bureau of Steam Engineering, machinery, plants, and tools	25,000.00
Bureau of Steam Engineering, civil establishment	1,800.00
Total	429,959.50

Nearly all of which could be saved without detriment to the public service.

It will be seen from this statement that this system of separate bureaus exists not only at the Navy Department here, but in every navy-yard, and every bureau has its separate organization here at Washington, with an admiral at the head and a number of clerks, all jealous of the rights and prerogatives of his bureau.

A more cumbersome and expensive system of government for the Navy Department could not well be invented.

To the credit of the Secretary of the Navy be it said, he has recommended that three of these Bureaus be consolidated, viz, Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Equipment. I only regret he did not recommend the consolidation of all the bureaus. It would save many hundreds of thousands of dollars annually, and I expect to offer during the consideration of this bill an amendment for the consolidation of the three Bureaus named.

On page 4 of the bill we find half a million dollars placed at the disposal of the President as an emergency fund.

We are in a period of profound peace so far as our Navy is concerned, and I can see no necessity for placing such a fund under the control of the President.

This is not legislation; it is an abdication of our legislative functions and is not necessary.

If there should be a deficiency, it should properly be met by the Committee on Appropriations in its annual deficiency bill; and I am anxious to see if the chairman of that great committee will keep silent while the prerogatives of his committee are undermined.

It is without precedent. Never before in the history of legislation has such a provision been put on a naval appropriation bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit me there, I call his attention to the fact that the President of the United States has at no time nor under any circumstances asked for this appropriation, and neither has the Secretary of the Navy, and therefore it is a voluntary item placed in there by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RIXEY. I do not know how it gets into the bill, but we have had no explanation of the necessity for it.

It is wholly and manifestly unnecessary. Page 3 of bill is a contingent fund for Navy, $10,000. In addition to this it is only necessary to take as an illustration one of the seven bureaus to show not only that everything is provided for that it is possible for the mind of man to conceive, but that contingent funds are also provided for each of the several bureaus.

Page 4 of bill, under head of Bureau of Navigation, after enumerating the more important items, provides for—

Freight, telegraphing in public business, postage on letters sent abroad, stationery, maps, railway guides, city directories, and necessary books of reference, ferriage, ice, apprehension of deserters and stragglers, continuous-service certificates, discharges, good-conduct badges, and medals for boys, schoolbooks for training apprentices, packing boxes, and materials, and other contingent expenses and emergencies arising under cognizance of the Bureau of Navigation, unforeseen and impossible to classify, $80,000.

Is not this Bureau well provided for? Is there any need of half a million dollars for the President to help out this Bureau, in the items "Unforeseen and impossible to classify?"

But this is not all under this Bureau, for at naval training station, Yerba Buena Island, we have—

Printing outfit and material, and maintenance of same, heating, lighting, and furniture, stationery, books, and periodicals, fresh water, ice, and washing, freight and expressage, packing boxes and materials, postage and telegraphing, telephones and all other contingent expenses, $30,000.

Page 20 of bill, contingent fund, Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Page 43 of bill, Bureau of Construction and Repair, provides for incidental expenses, such as advertising, freight, foreign postage, telegrams, telephone service, photographing, books, professional magazines, plans, stationery, and insurance, for drafting room, etc.

Pages 60, 61, 62 of bill, contingent fund, Marine Corps. "and for all other emergencies and extraordinary expenses arising at home and abroad, but impossible to anticipate or classify," etc.

Twelve contingent funds besides the one of half a million dollars for the President, including, by name, everything that it is possible to conceive, from "towels, soap, combs, and brushes," to the repair of ships, and everything else, as it is expressed, "for all emergencies and extraordinary expenses arising, at home or abroad, but impossible to anticipate," a total of $467,300 for such contingent expenses.

The unusual provision, therefore, of half a million dollars in addition is unnecessary. No naval war is in progress and none expected.

Another matter in which the minority differ from the majority is whether any of the cruisers which are to be built shall be constructed at the Government navy-yards.

The Government has now a half dozen highly equipped navy-yards, maintained at an expense of hundreds of thousands of dollars annually, and fully able to build not only third-class cruisers, but battle ships. Why not make use of these plants? The capital is lying idle, or at least not turned to the most practical account.

It is not an untried venture. The Maine, Texas, Cincinnati, Raleigh, Minneapolis, Indiana, and Detroit were all built at the Government navy-yards, the Maine and Cincinnati at New York Navy-Yard, and the Texas and Raleigh at Norfolk.

Admiral Hichborn, Chief of Bureau of Construction and Repair, believes that the Government should build some of its ships. He says:

Mr. MEYER. Therefore, if you thought it desirable to construct vessels at the navy-yards, you would not be in position to do it?

Admiral HICHBORN. It could be done by an increase of the force. The advantage of building at the navy-yard, of which I am an advocate, is that when you have a ship to build, you have a certain number of men employed; and if a vessel comes in needing repairs, and it is in a hurry, you can take the men off the job and put them on the repair ship. In that way they are always at work. If, however, you have to go to hiring and discharging men all the time, you can not get as good class of men and you can not do it as economically. I believe in building ultimately at our own yards; but if you took all the work the shipbuilders are doing to-day, you could not do it.

Mr. DAYTON. Do you think it would be possible for the Government yards to build the larger battle ships or cruisers?

Admiral HICHBORN. They can build at New York anything that can be built anywhere in the world, with a slight addition of new tools.

Mr. DAYTON. Is that true?

Admiral HICHBORN. Certainly. All we want is an order to build any ship at New York, Norfolk, Boston, Portsmouth, and Mare Island, and we can build any ship that anybody else can build. It is only a question of a few new tools, and not many either.

Naval Constructor Bowles says, on page 2 of his hearings:

Now, if in these yards, which are essential to the object of the Navy, we should keep a vessel or two vessels building all the time, we would have a nucleus of a complete force and it would be necessary, in order to do that work with a reasonable degree of economy, that our yard should be kept in good order.

Second. The fact that a vessel is building in a navy-yard makes it possible to conduct the repair work of the fleet economically and rapidly, because if a vessel comes in for repairs, as soon as it is determined what it is necessary to do the force is available, and every shop is in working order, and the chances are that there is a stock of material on hand of every kind that would be needed in the construction of the ship, which can be drawn upon to make those repairs. This matter of having the material on hand is one of the most essential items in carrying on work rapidly.

This opinion is concurred in by Constructors Stahl and Baxter, and it is only necessary to read their testimony to be impressed by their intelligence and sound reasoning.

We all know that there are large interests opposed to the Government building its ships, but I ask, why not? We have magnificent equipments, maintained at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars annually.

Of course the great shipbuilding concerns do not wish the Government to build its own ships, and I begin to believe that the only way to place a limit to the building of ships is for the Government to build its own ships. As long as it puts the ships out to contract at an expense of millions of dollars each, these shipbuilding concerns are interested in manufacturing public opinion and forcing the Government to build great ships, whether it needs them or has the men and officers to man them or not.

Great Britain and France are building at least a portion of their ships in their navy-yards. Why should not we? There is no reason except the one suggested—opposition of private concerns. Let the three smaller cruisers be built in the Government yards and an account of the cost kept. We can then form some estimate of where the ships should be built in the future.

This bill provides for 2 battle ships, 3 armored cruisers, and 3 protected cruisers, the total cost of which will be $28,000,000, exclusive of the cost of armor and armament. I insist we should be able to build them in the Government navy-yards as cheaply as private concerns, and the testimony of the constructors in the Navy is overwhelming that we are prepared now to build the largest battle ships and cruisers.

Mr. GAINES. Who were they?

Mr. RIXEY. One was Constructor Bowles, who had charge of the Brooklyn Navy-Yard; another was Constructor Stahl, who has charge of the Norfolk Navy-Yard, and another was Constructor Baxter, from Boston.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Baxter was one of the officers in charge in building the Oregon?

Mr. RIXEY. All these matters have been thoroughly elaborated, and I will not longer detain the committee on this subject.

In the consideration of this subject of armor plate two questions are to be considered: First, is the price now demanded by the armor-plate combine reasonable; and if not, second, the remedy.

We are absolutely at the mercy of the Bethlehem and Carnegie companies, which admittedly have an understanding that they will not bid against each other. It has a monopoly and is a trust. It has, therefore, the power of extortion.

The price now demanded by these companies for the Krupp armor is $545 per ton.

Is this a reasonable price?

Under date of December 31, 1896, Secretary Herbert transmitted to Congress his report as to the cost of armor plate, which is the best official information we have had upon the subject. In the report he says:

FINAL COST.

It has been determined that the cost of the labor and material in a ton of double-forged nickel-steel harveyed armor, including allowances for losses in manufacture, is $197.78. This comprises every element of cost in its manufacture save and except only the maintenance of plant. If 10 per cent be allowed for maintenance, the value of the plant must be determined upon.

COST AND PRICE OF ARMOR.

The present value of an armor plant like those of the two companies referred to—the price at which such a plant could be erected—is, according to the figures heretofore attained, $1,500,000; the allowance for maintenance, at 10 per cent, $150,000 per annum while the plant is in operation. If we suppose that 2,500 tons of armor are manufactured per annum, this will give an average per ton of $60, which, being added to the cost of labor and material, will make, in round numbers, $256. If 3,000 tons per annum are manufactured, the price of each ton would be ascertained by adding $50 to the $198, or $248, so that we may take $250, in round numbers, as the cost of a ton of armor when the companies have fair orders for work.

Continuing, he says:

It therefore seems to me that under all the circumstances, considering the uncertainty of future contracts and in view of the fact that these contractors have heretofore established plants on the faith of orders they were to receive thereafter from the Government, it would not be inequitable to allow them 50 per cent upon the future cost of manufacturing armor. Fifty per cent added to $250 would be $375; but it is to be remembered that the Government has heretofore furnished the nickel, and that the item of $197.78 for labor and material does not cover the cost of the nickel.

It is therefore suggested that in future contracts manufacturers shall be required to furnish their own nickel. Adding $20 for this item to $375, we have $395 per ton, and allowing something for keeping nickel on hand, we have in round numbers $400 per ton.

The Government is now paying for reforged nickel Harvey armor $583 per ton, with the nickel, which is furnished by the Government, added, $583. At the prices herein suggested $500,000 would be saved in the armor of each battle ship.

At the time of this report we were paying $583 per ton, a difference of $500,000 on each battle ship.

Congress limited the price to $400 per ton and thus saved this immense amount to the Government. Said Secretary Herbert:

If Congress shall decide to adopt the recommendations in this report and refuse to pay more than $400 per ton for first-class armor hereafter, it may be reasonably expected that all the power and acumen that can be brought to bear by interested parties will be exerted to show that this report is in error and to expose any inaccuracies it may contain.

No such attempt has been successful, and since 1897 we have never paid over $400 per ton.

But now come these same companies, which admittedly had been exacting $500,000 for a battle ship more than they should, and demand $545 for armor called the Krupp, the process for the manufacture of which is neither a secret nor patented.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. I have here an official letter from Charles O'Neil, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, to the Secretary of the Navy, dated December 12, 1898, in which he says:

4. It is impossible for the Bureau to state whether the price named is excessive or not, as the process of manufacture is kept secret; but enough is known to lead the Bureau to suppose that the cost of making armor by the new process is not $100 per ton greater than by the present process, as the principal difference lies in the composition of the metal and in the process of carburization prior to tempering. The same machinery is necessary for handling, forging, bending, and machine finishing in either case, while in the new process one expensive feature is omitted, namely, reforging after carburization.

Then this new armor does not and should not cost $100 more than the harveyized plate, but they want to charge $145 more.

17. It is estimated that 2,697 tons of armor will be required for each of the three vessels of the Maine class, and 545 tons for each of the four harbor-defense monitors, or a total of 10,271 tons for the seven vessels. At the present price of $411.20 per ton (including royalty), 10,271 tons of armor would cost $4,223,435.20, and at $545 per ton the cost would be $5,597,695, or $1,374,259.80 more for the new process armor than for the old; but the vessels will receive 25 per cent better protection.

20. The new-process armor is referred to as the "improved Harvey," and sometimes as that made by the "Krupp process."

23. While the armor manufacturers have intimated that the cost of the new-process armor would be $545 per ton, it is by no means certain that they will specify that sum in their bids, especially if they have reason to believe that there will be any competition, or if they know that the Department can, if it chooses, establish an armor factory. The sum named by them is undoubtedly the maximum price they expect to ask. Hence it might be well to insert a proviso in the appropriation bill to the effect that if the Secretary of the Navy is unable to make satisfactory terms as to the cost of armor, he is authorized to proceed at once with the establishment of a Government armor factory, and the necessary funds are made available for this purpose.

Admiral O'Neil favors an armor factory to bring these armor makers to reasonable terms.

Mr. BARBER. Will the gentleman allow me? Is it not a fact that Mr. O'Neil appeared before the committee and testified that the material alone in the Krupp process cost about $33 more a ton, and that he allowed $22 a ton more for labor for the Krupp process?

Mr. RIXEY. I think that is true.

Mr. BARBER. So that that letter would not be the present views of Admiral O'Neil in relation to this armor.

Mr. GAINES. He knew that when he made this statement.

Mr. BARBER. But he appeared before the committee a month ago.

Mr. RIXEY. Admiral O'Neil did not give any satisfactory reason why the manufacturers should charge $545 per ton.

Mr. BARBER. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.

Mr. BARBER. Did not Secretary Long figure up how the extra $33 was made up—how the extra $33 for material was made up?

Mr. RIXEY. Suppose that is true, how do you get $545?

Mr. BARBER. In this way: We start with $400 as the basis of double-forged Harvey armor plate, recommended by Secretary Herbert. We have $33 for extra material, $22 for additional labor, making $55. Now, for the same size of Krupp armor plate it is from 30 to 33 per cent less in thickness, so for a given plate, or for a given amount of armor covering a ship of the same size and the same dimensions, they would receive, instead of armor 16¼ inches, 11½ inches under the Krupp process—one-fifth less in thickness. Or, as Secretary Long puts it, on a ship there would be for covering of the same dimensions 500 tons less of Krupp armor—that is, armor made by the Krupp process—than by the Harvey process, the Krupp process requiring more time, more labor, and the company would receive that much less.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take the time of the committee to reply to the gentleman, because I propose to take the statement of Admiral O'Neil as the basis for what I have to say in regard to the cost of armor plate. His opinion may be said to be favorable enough to the companies, as he thinks we should pay $545 per ton. On page 11 of his testimony he gives a statement which I use, except I allow 3 per cent instead of 6 per cent:

3 per cent on plant valued at $4,000,000	$120,000
3 per cent on working capital of $1,000,000	30,000
8 per cent for deterioration (Carnegie only claims 5 per cent)	320,000
Cost of making 5,000 tons at $250	1,250,000
Total	1,720,000

$1,720,000 ÷ 5,000 = $344, cost per ton.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. Are you reading from the testimony of Admiral O'Neil?

Mr. RIXEY. I am reading from his testimony, with the simple change that I allow 3 per cent interest, whereas in the table I use he charges 6 per cent interest.

Mr. HAWLEY. But his testimony is the basis of your remarks?

Mr. RIXEY. It is.

Mr. HAWLEY. Would it disturb the gentleman if I asked him to read from his testimony in which he discusses the making or armor plate by the Government?

Mr. RIXEY. I will read it if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think it would be interesting, as you are referring to him and introducing him as your witness.

Mr. RIXEY. If I do not state his testimony fairly, you will have an opportunity to correct me. I take my statement from the table which he furnished, and the only change I have made is that I allow 3 per cent interest, while he allowed 6.

Mr. Chairman, Secretary Herbert's report and the determination of Congress not to pay over $400 and, in default of getting armor at that price, to build a factory secured us the armor plate at $400 when we were paying $583 per ton, saving to the Treasury $500,000 on a battle ship.

Let us pursue the same wise policy. I think $400 enough for the Krupp armor, but I am willing to go further and make the limit $445; but if we can not get it at that price, I am for building an armor-plate factory.

Mr. Chairman, I differ with the majority in the statement of fact that the Secretary of the Navy recommended provision for two battle ships in addition to the cruisers, all of which are virtually battle ships. It is contended that while the Secretary only recommended the six cruisers in his annual report, in the "hearings" before the committee he asked for or recommended provision for two battle ships. It is only necessary to examine these hearings to see that this contention is not well founded. The committee evidently wanted him to so recommend, but he studiously failed to do so, as will be seen from the following extracts, which I take from the hearings:

On page 9 Secretary Long says:

> You gentlemen must bear in mind in making the recommendation it never occurred to me that Congress would give us three battle ships, costing $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 apiece, and also three cruisers costing a great deal of money, and three protected cruisers of 8,000 tons, also costing a great deal.
> Mr. DAYTON. Looking the world's naval progress and advance in the face, I want you to state whether you regard an increase of three battle ships and three cruisers as an unwarrantable one.
> Secretary LONG. Not at all. I think you will come to it, of course, in future years. If I were on the Naval Committee, I should be inclined to say that with three battle ships already authorized and construction not yet begun, if you will give us three big cruisers and three smaller cruisers, we will have enough large ships to go to the country with this year.

We now have in the Navy, including ships authorized as well as under construction, 15 first-class battle ships, 1 second-class battle ship, 15 armored cruisers, 21 protected cruisers, a total of 52 battle ships and cruisers, all of which are virtually battle ships, and with the addition of gunboats, torpedo boats, etc., a total of 303. As stated in the report of the majority, seventeen years ago our Navy ranked twentieth among the nations of the world; it now ranks fourth.

Mr. Chairman, we have not the officers or men for the ships already authorized. Secretary Long in his letter under date of February 12, 1900, Document No. 168, on page 8, gives 3,048 as the number of officers required for all the vessels of the Navy, whereas we only have a total of 1,601 officers now on the active list. (Page 6 of letter.) The Navy has not sufficient officers to man the vessels now ready for commission, not taking into account the vessels not yet contracted for. Why, then, the necessity for the authorization at this time of two additional battle ships to cost from six to ten million dollars? I fear the answer is, Mr. Chairman, to be found in the immense pressure which the great shipbuilding and armor-plate concerns bring to bear upon legislation favorable to their interests. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RIXEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Mr. Chairman, the naval establishment is to be increased. It is now inadequate for the country's needs. For years to come the naval appropriation bill will provide further additions to the Navy. A sea force is the natural weapon, both offensive and defensive, for the United States. The country's extensive coast line, the vast interests of our people the world over, the slight possibility of an invasion of the States by land, the comparative ease and rapidity with which an army can be raised, and the traditional policy of this Government to minimize its permanent land force combine to necessitate a powerful and extensive Navy. It will be our chief reliance against foreign intrusion and interference; it is the most effective and persuasive argument that can be advanced by this country for the privilege of pursuing its way in peace.

With whatever else it may be charged, the recent war at least has sharply drawn attention to the naval needs of the country. Justly proud of the wondrous record of the Navy from its very inception, an enlightened and patriotic people will insist that it be maintained in sufficient power and at the highest possible efficiency.

The Committee on Naval Affairs in its report has suggested a building policy for the country:

> To build as we have been building, gradually, on broad lines and upon the most advanced ideas of naval construction; not so fast that we will be ahead of the advance of naval progress, but slow enough to secure all the benefits of new improvements and new inventions; or, better still, to do as the American Navy has always done when given an opportunity, to lead the march of the best naval construction, which it demonstrates its ability to do on at least one memorable occasion in American history, when the little "cheese box of Ericsson," in that great contest with the Merrimac, blazed the pathway for the mighty battle ship of to-day.

The policy suggested by the committee, it seems to me, is both conservative and wise. Assuming that it is, it becomes pertinent to inquire, How can the country continue supreme in naval construction?

The most significant feature of the majority's report is the omission of all discussion on this most important question. The committee recommends the building by contract of two battle ships, three armored cruisers, and three protected cruisers. The vessels recommended are the most powerful of their respective classes. The committee says:

> The maximum cost of the ships herein authorized, exclusive of armor and armament, will be $23,350,000. This is the largest naval programme ever submitted by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, and is in accord with the wishes and recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy and Admiral Dewey, and will, we believe, meet the just demands of public sentiment. The past year in naval construction has been marked by the most liberal naval programmes on the part of all foreign nations. At the present time there is pending in the Reichstag of Germany a naval bill which, if passed, will increase the tonnage of the present German navy 422,000 tons, a larger tonnage than that of her present navy.

A perusal of the views of the majority would never have even raised a suspicion that any other method of building these vessels than by contract had ever been suggested. Yet, Mr. Chairman, for several days the committee listened to four of the ablest men in the corps of naval constructors upon the advisability and advantage of building some of the vessels in the navy-yards. These men were unanimous in the opinion that it would be of immense benefit to the Government to build in the navy-yards. The only objection to the proposition was made by the Secretary of the Navy, upon grounds which I believe are without merit; yet the committee ignores completely the evidence before it and withholds from the House information of the most important character. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, silence is the only answer that can be made to the arguments advanced before the committee in favor of the proposition.

Governmental facilities should be utilized for the best interests of the people. The welfare of the many and the interests of the country should not suffer that a favored few may profit. Some of the vessels to be authorized for the Navy should be built in the navy-yards, that the Government may reap full benefit from their existence.

Our modern Navy was commenced about the year 1883. Since that time $98,529,511.85 have been put into completed ships. The estimated cost of vessels now under construction is $62,570,610.23. Since that time about 126 vessels have been built, are in the course of construction, or have been authorized. Twelve have not yet been commenced. Four of the completed vessels were built in the navy-yards; two vessels, I believe, were rebuilt therein, and, with the exception of two or three tugs, the remaining vessels have been given to private yards. At present there are 50 vessels in private yards and 12 authorized by last year's bill waiting to be sent there. In the navy-yards there are no vessels in the course of construction.

The majority of the committee, in defense of the proposition to substitute barracks for enlisted men in the place of receiving ships at New York and Mare Island, state that—

Our Government is the last of the maritime nations to adopt the barrack system for its seamen. Every other nation has them. The British Government has already expended $7,000,000 for the purpose of properly housing its seamen. France, Germany, Italy, Russia, Austria, Japan have already constructed barracks for their seamen.

The conduct of maritime nations along certain lines is legitimately used by the committee to demonstrate the wisdom of its recommendation. Experience teaches, and it is the part of wisdom to profit by the experience of others. It is certainly remarkable, however, that the keen-eyed majority of the committee should be blind to the lessons that have been taught in the dockyards of every maritime nation of the continent.

In seventeen years, Mr. Chairman, the United States have built four vessels in navy-yards. What, in the meanwhile, have the other maritime nations of the world been doing? It is unnecessary to examine the records of the past seventeen years. I submit here tables which show the war ships building in England, France, Germany, Russia, and Italy during the year 1899:

These figures challenge the consideration of thoughtful men. What a spectacle is presented to our people in these closing days of the nineteenth century. Every maritime nation of note except the United States utilizing to the fullest extent the facilities of its dockyards for building purposes, while this country, that is now ranked fourth on the list, but in capacity, efficiency, and real fighting effectiveness has demonstrated, when apparently under greater disadvantage than at present, its superiority to the acknowledged sea power of the world, deliberately casts aside the advantages afforded by its own plants, and permits them in idleness to deteriorate in order to build up and enrich the business of a favored few.

The Naval Committee had before it Rear-Admiral Hichborn, Chief of the Bureau of Construction, and Constructors Bowles, Baxter, and Stahl, of the New York, Boston, and Norfolk navy-yards, respectively. All agree that three of the navy-yards are equipped and ready for building purposes. They are unanimously of the opinion that the Government, despite many disadvantages, would build almost as cheap as, if not cheaper than, private yards; and, if it did cost more to build in navy-yards, that the advantages that would result from new work being under way would more than offset any such disadvantages.

To maintain the force and plant of any yard in the most efficient manner it is necessary that new work be continually under way. Mechanics naturally seek employment wherever continuous engagements are probable. The shipbuilding plants of the country are scattered along the coast. Men can not afford frequently to shift distances of several hundred miles to take employment. Even if it be contended that the primary purpose of a navy-yard is to do repair work, which contention can find little to sustain it, the necessity for new construction is plainly apparent.

The intermittent employment that must result from repair work alone makes it most difficult to secure the most competent workmen. It nullifies all effort to organize and retain a skilled force, the efficiency of which is increased by the continuity of employment. Wages necessarily are higher for such work, and the natural inclination of human nature to retain a place as long as possible renders the labor of men temporarily employed less productive than if long terms of employment were assured.

Continuity of employment is essential to secure the best efforts and results. Only by continued construction can it be had. This is the experience of all men. In the House of Commons in 1879 Lord Brassey, the greatest civil member that ever served in the Admiralty and one of the most eminent authorities on naval affairs in England, strenuously deprecated the dismissal of good workmen from the dockyards, which the Gladstone ministry had ordered in an effort to reduce the expenditures of the Government.

The great fluctuations in the members employed—not only inflict great inconvenience on the workmen but involve expense to the country. You can not expect to obtain labor so cheaply for a temporary as for a permanent employment.

The efficiency of force and plant being promoted by the continuity of employment, which results from the construction of new vessels, it is possible to do repair work in a more economical and rapid manner. Emergencies arise in the service when repairs must be made with the utmost rapidity. With what ease a force of men, when at hand, can be diverted to such work with untold saving of time and money. Such a force would not have the temptation to drag the work out as much as possible; rather, just pride in their efficiency would urge haste in the completion of such repairs. As Naval Constructor William J. Baxter, U. S. N., said in a paper entitled "Navy-yard expenses," read at the fifth general meeting of the Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers, held in New York November 11 and 12, 1897:

Nothing is more destructive to the morale of navy-yard workmen than periods of intense activity, requiring a large number of men and overtime work, alternating with periods where the work is not urgent and the lack of funds necessitates large discharges. The men do not usually understand the reasons for these spurts and frequently regard them as unnecessary, consider themselves aggrieved, and do not put forth their best efforts when they feel that their discharge will follow the completion of the emergency work. Workmen employed for short periods only are also not familiar with the work to be done nor with the tools, appliances, and methods of doing it. The small number who can be retained at all times are selected with great care, and they are skilled, energetic, and reliable in every emergency, perform every duty in the best manner, and cheerfully respond whenever unusual exertions are needed, but the cost of their work is apparently great, owing to the large maintenance and other charges.

Moreover, the amount of repair work required will perceptibly decrease. Men occupying responsible positions in the service would no longer be driven to their wit's ends to devise some means of keeping a portion of their force employed so as to retain sufficient men to form the nucleus of a proper force.

It is a somewhat peculiar situation in which some of the constructors of the Navy are placed. While not permitted to build ships in navy-yards, they are charged with the duty of inspecting the work in private yards. It is claimed that both the Government and the contractors are injured by such inspection. I hazard the assertion, however, that the Government alone suffers from such inspection. It was pointed out to the Committee on Naval Affairs that, when confronted with the prospect of inspection by men who have not had sufficient opportunities to qualify themselves for such work, the contractors simply add to the amount of their bid a sum sufficient to cover the expense of what might be aptly called "too much inspection." To borrow the language of Constructor Bowles:

A man who has had no experience, and is put in charge of the inspection of an important piece of work, and in order that he may be on the safe side he will be much more particular, he will be much more insistent, and require things to be done, and much more carefully than if he had had experience and knew what was necessary to fulfill his object. It may be said that the more particular an inspector is the better man he is for the Government, and if you were only making a single contract that might be true; but, as a matter of fact, this work is continuous. After one ship is finished that same inspector goes on and inspects the next vessel which that contractor builds, and the contractor says, "If this is the sort of thing I have to put up with, I will add about 15 or 20 per cent to the next price," and that is an actual fact that that has been done; and if the people who have this work to do had the experience, and knew from their own knowledge what was actually necessary, then that would not take place, and I mean to say that a great economy would be accomplished in that way. On the other hand, a man who has had no experience in doing the work does not know what to look for, and that will enable the contractor to get around him in many ways that he will never see unless he has had it to do himself.

By constructing some vessels in the navy-yards an opportunity is given to men to learn practically many things that can not be acquired in the schools. Surely, since the several bureaus of the Department design and plan the various vessels of the Navy, with their minute and multitudinous details, the same men should be, and in fact are, able to build from these plans. The objection, therefore, does not lie that the men of the service are not competent to build.

A standard of workmanship and design will be established and maintained, dependent not upon theory but upon practical experience. The private yards, realizing that there exists a standard to which their work must conform, will give better results than can now be obtained for an equal expenditure.

In addition to these advantages, it must be remembered that in the navy-yards the question of profit is eliminated. The expense of maintaining large forces of inspectors and the costs of trial trips are saved to the Government.

If the navy-yards are utilized for this work another very important advantage will be gained. No combination of the private yards to take advantage of the Government in the hour of necessity would then be possible. There could not be a repetition of the armor-plate extortion. The Government could always command honest treatment and fair dealing from the private establishments.

Mr. GAINES. If the work were done in our navy-yards we could modify the law so as to make malfeasance a crime, and in that way we could enforce the rights of the Government better than if the work were left to private establishments.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. It is not necessary for us to make any change of the law in this respect. We rely upon our officers to design these vessels——

Mr. GAINES. Those officers are under the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. And experience shows that they have designed the best vessels in the world. It is ridiculous to assert that the men who plan such vessels are not competent to supervise their construction.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman knows how rotten plate was palmed off on the Government by Carnegie.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. My belief is that if these inspectors had had practical experience in making armor plate there would never have been any difficulty of that kind.

Mr. GAINES. This plate was turned in at night when the inspectors were off duty.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I have heard that, but I am not discussing the armor-plate proposition at present. It is true that all the advantages are not with the Government. There are some disadvantages, which, I believe, are more than offset for the reason already given.

There are two objections urged, however, which should receive some attention. It is urged that because wages are higher and a work day shorter in the navy-yards than in the private yards that the expense of building new vessels would be so greatly in excess of the cost in private yards as to render it inexpedient to utilize the navy-yards for building purposes. Those who argued in this way call attention to the fact, too, that in England, where the dockyards build more cheaply than the private yards, the hours and wages are practically alike. They overlook, however, that in the dockyards in England about one-third of the men are called "established," and that such men are paid about 30 per cent more than the ordinary mechanic "and have a pension to look forward to when advanced in life and incapacitated." So that while here the mechanic in the navy-yard receives higher wages ordinarily than in the private yards, that is offset largely by the practice in England of pensioning the employees of the dockyards.

The chief objection to the utilization of the navy-yards for building purposes is the fact that the four vessels built by the Government therein cost more than vessels built by contract. It would be miraculous, indeed, Mr. Chairman, if that were not so. It is well known that when the first vessels were ordered built in the navy-yards, none had been built therein in twenty-five years. Steel shipbuilding was in its infancy, and a steel ship had never been built in a navy-yard in this country. The yards were absolutely barren of equipment. According to the testimony of the constructor who was in charge of the Norfolk Navy-Yard when the Texas and Raleigh were ordered to be built there, the only plant or machinery then in the yard was a sawmill. It was necessary to secure proper tools and machinery and to organize and train a force of mechanics. Some of the difficulties that confronted the constructors in charge of the building of these vessels can be inferred when it is stated that for a time the principal shipwright at one of the yards was a school-teacher. Does anyone wonder that vessels built under such circumstances cost more than those built in private yards?

The difference, however, is not so great as it is popularly supposed. Comparisons have been made that are exceedingly misleading. It has been the practice to compare the final cost of the navy-yard built ship with the contract price of the contract ship. The contract price, however, is far below the actual cost of the vessel. It does not include premiums and expense of trial trips, for which there has been paid upward of $3,881,000. Neither does it include the charges for inspection, which in the case of the battle ship Kentucky, not yet completed, to use the language of Constructor Stahl, "You paid $60,000 plus a good deal more;" nor, in many instances, does it include the furniture, blocks, boats, cooperage, and many other things. So that comparisons as to the cost of vessels in the navy-yards and in the private yards have often been misleading. The following tables, prepared by Constructors Bowles and Stahl, illustrate the difference between the contract price and actual cost of certain vessels built by contract, and affords an opportunity for comparison with vessels built in the navy-yards under the adverse conditions that existed at the time.

The conditions that exist to-day in the navy-yards are vastly different from those of fourteen years ago. The yards are now properly equipped for building purposes. The regulations under which men are employed prevent the abuses that were then prevalent. The mechanics are trained and properly organized, and some improvement has been made in the methods of administration. As the committee says in its report:

Seventeen years ago we had practically no facilities for building ships, and what we had were discredited. We were obliged to buy our armament and armor, and even in one case our plans, from foreign countries. To-day we are not only building ships in American shipyards, of American material, by American labor, on American plans for ourselves, but also for some of the leading nations of the world. Such has been the advance which has been made in naval progress in our own country.

The Commissioner of Navigation, in his report for 1899, points out that—

The scale and steadiness of operations is of even more importance than either of these factors [cost of materials and the wages and efficiency of labor] and probably more than both combined. Shipbuilding materials are lower in the United States than in Great Britain, and wages of labor are lower in Germany than in Great Britain, yet Great Britain turns out steamships more cheaply than either country. Her success is due to the magnitude of her shipbuilding operations. The average time of construction is much less there than elsewhere, involving saving of interest to the purchaser and manifest economies to the builder. British yards reproduce a number of vessels from one set of plans, thus effecting a large saving.

On the Atlantic coast of the United States occasionally "sister ships" have been built where one set of plans has served for two vessels, but except in the case of the four Admiral steamships, the Bureau knows of no instances where more than two steamships for the foreign trade have been built in the United States from one set of plans. The money value of experience, of doing the third, fourth, or fifth time work which has been done once successfully, is recognized in every walk of industrial life. The continuity of work enables British shipbuilding plants to assemble and keep together their technical and skilled corps in various departments. In the United States, except on the lakes, thus far our extensive naval construction alone has rendered these results practicable in some yards. In short, Great Britain's great advantage to-day over the United States and Germany lies in the fact that she conducts a wholesale instead of a retail shipbuilding business, and that, except on the Pacific, her shipowners are established in the trade.

These advantages can not be offset by short-lived efforts. Whatever system is adopted by the United States must be pursued uninterruptedly for some years.

This extract, Mr. Chairman, undoubtedly is familiar to many in this House. It is the argument of the Commissioner of Navigation in favor of the so-called Hanna-Payne ship-subsidy bill. It shows that this Government, by liberal contracts with the private yards for naval vessels, has enabled such yards to attain a standard of proficiency that qualifies them to compete for foreign construction.

Shipbuilding is no longer an "infant" industry in this country. It is time that the facilities of the Government for building purposes were given attention. Not until the navy-yards build systematically and continuously a number of vessels can a fair comparison be made between the results attained there and in private establishments.

More than $100,000,000 have been expended upon the navy-yards of this country. The value of the real estate, chattels, and machinery plants of the three yards conceded to be equipped for building purposes on June 30, 1899, as per appraisal under Department (Navy) Circular No. 94, is as follows:

Navy-yard.	Real estate and chattels.	Machinery plant.
New York, N. Y	$19,165,023.79	$543,277.68
Norfolk, Va	5,649,554.37	560,544.70
Mare Island, Cal	4,127,611.48	435,420.00
Total	28,942,189.64	1,539,242.38

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, a machine shop to cost $750,000 is in process of erection at the New York Yard, which, when completed, "will be," according to the Secretary of the Navy and the Bureau of Steam Engineering, "the most complete and efficient in the world, every advantage being taken of the latest devices of proven excellence."

Are these plants to be utilized in the most efficient and economical manner, as demonstrated by the experience of the nations of the Continent? That question, Mr. Chairman, must be answered by this House primarily. It will be easy to place the blame for the failure to reinaugurate the policy of building in the navy-yards.

This is not a novel policy. The men who plan, design, and critically watch the construction of vessels for the Government must be competent to build. No more opportune time for the inauguration of this proposition is likely to come than the present. The shipyards are crowded with work. For the year ending June 30, 1899, "our construction of steel steam vessels was greater than in 1891 or than in any year in our history." The Report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1899 discloses that—

> Our greatest annual production (of ocean steam vessels) was during the year just closed, June 30, 1899, when it amounted to 43,871 gross tons. Seagoing steamships are all at the present time built of steel.
> It is within bounds to assert that the construction of 100,000 tons of ocean steel steamships (including those for the coasting trade), in addition to the naval contracts and contracts in other Government vessels on which they are engaged, would overtax the present annual capacity of our shipyards.

When it is remembered that the average annual output of the yards of Great Britain is 968,000 gross tons, the following extract from an article in the Scientific American for March 17, 1900, is of special significance:

> Lastly, if the proposed measure is carried out, not merely with regard to the Brooklyn yard, but to the other mentioned, the total war-ship building capacity would be doubled at a stroke, a consideration which of itself should be sufficient to induce Congress to take favorable action on the question. The enormous increase which is being made in the navies of the continental powers, whose interests in the great commercial war of the day are bound to come into violent conflict with our own, should be a warning to us to stand ready to double, if necessary, our present rate of output of war vessels. At a comparatively slight expense it would be possible to add the navy-yards at Brooklyn, Norfolk, and Mare Island to our all too small list of available war-ship building yards.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] in the course of his discussion called attention to the fact that when ships are built in the navy-yards there is no guaranty for the quality of the work. A vessel, he said, may on its trial trip turn over, and various other things might happen; while, as he argued, in the case of vessels built in private yards there is a bond given by the contractor, and unsatisfactory work of any kind is not paid for. The gentleman did not go quite far enough in his statements. He should have said that the Government accepts vessels built in private yards upon the opinion and experience and knowledge of these very men to whom we would intrust in our navy-yards the construction of vessels, and that when a vessel is accepted all responsibility on the part of the contractor ends.

This, Mr. Chairman, is not a blow at private enterprise. It will injure no legitimate business. It will raise the standard of workmanship that prevails in private establishments; the navy-yards will be more efficient and be more economically maintained. The war-ship building capacity of the country will be doubled. If it be possible to make in our own establishments the finest, most effective, and at the same time the cheapest ordnance in the world, what will prevent the navy-yards, fully equipped for the work, building ships the equal of any afloat and as economically as elsewhere in the country?

It is merely a question of men, money, methods, and opportunity. The men are ready. The money is to be appropriated. Methods that increase expense can readily be changed. All that is needed is the opportunity. Give it. Let the men who plan, design, and inspect the construction of our vessels build some of them. Permit the genius and the talents of our officers, so brilliantly displayed in every other branch of naval work, a fair field here. A higher standard will speedily be set in naval construction; great economy will be effected in the naval establishment; officers and men alike will be the better equipped for their various duties; a higher efficiency will be attained, and an enormous saving will be had in the ordinary work of the yards; and all the while the interests of good—of the best—government will be subserved, by securing the largest and best results for the least expenditure of public money. [Applause.]

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I rise for the purpose of making a speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yielded his hour yesterday.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. So I understand, sir; but I also understand that there is no limitation——

The CHAIRMAN. It will require unanimous consent for the gentleman to proceed.

Mr. FOSS. I ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the gentleman from Kentucky may proceed—how long?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. For a very few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the proposition when he understands what it is.

Mr. FOSS. I ask that the gentleman be given such time as he may wish.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky may proceed with his remarks, occupying such time as he desires. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I intended to say something on this bill, but I realize the folly of undertaking to discuss measures about which we differ to empty benches. I simply rise for the purpose of saying that, so far as I am personally concerned, I have absolutely no pride of opinion in the minority report. It is a matter of no more concern to me personally than to any other citizen of the Republic. I should have said something to members of the House, if the opportunity had been given me, upon what my business judgment suggests is best for the Government.

I have no prejudice on earth either for or against any proposition that is advocated by the majority or the minority. I have experienced at the hands of the chairman of the committee and of my colleagues nothing but the greatest courtesy and kindness; and I entertain for them personally the highest regard. It was only from a sense of public duty that I was induced to join with a portion of my colleagues in presenting the minority report. I shall avail myself of the privilege given under the five-minute rule to say what I think is pertinent to the questions of difference between us.

I regret very much that the interest in this matter is not great enough to induce gentlemen to remain in their places. At the risk, however, Mr. Chairman, of being a little disagreeable, I desire to say something foreign to this bill but pertinent to the conduct of affairs in this House.

The conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that I have reached, in my limited service in this body, on matters to which I think the attention of the House and the country should be directed—matters fraught with great interest to the American people in my humble opinion, and that is the point to which I wished to ask the attention of members—is as to the right of the members of this body to speak openly and criticise freely on the floor of the House what takes place in the committee rooms.

I shall avail myself of the first opportunity presented to offer an amendment to the rule covering that point. I shall ask the adoption of an amendment giving to each and every member of the House the right to state the position of his colleagues on committees and what they said and what they did and how they voted behind the committee doors. I am also heartily in favor, Mr. Chairman, of making it compulsory on every committee of the House to open its doors not only to the members, but to the press and the public.

With no intention, therefore, to insinuate anything even by indirection against the committee or the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I will state on my own responsibility that the devilment done in Congress is done largely in the committee rooms, where the people can not find out the facts. Vicious legislation is there adopted; patriotic purposes, which are intended to serve the people, are throttled and strangled to death, and every man knows——

Mr. HOPKINS (interrupting). Will the gentleman allow me a question just there?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky what rule prohibits a member of a committee from stating what has taken place in the committee?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I can not turn to the rule now, but I will say that such a rule or practice, at least, exists. The gentleman himself must have seen it, for it is brought into effect in the proceedings of the House frequently.

Mr. HOPKINS. I doubt very much whether there is any such rule. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. DALZELL. There is no rule of the House. It is only the common practice of parliamentary law.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Well, it exists in practice, whether it be adopted as one of the rules of the House or whether it be, as the gentleman says, parliamentary law. It is enforced here, as we all know, for in this very session the Speaker called a gentleman to order for attempting to discuss matters which took place in the committee rooms.

But it really does not matter whether you have formally adopted it, that is the custom and the practice of the House, and it should not prevail.

Mr. LACEY. The rule is claimed to be necessary in order that the freedom of action and the interchange of views amongst the members of the committee may not be hampered, and if a change should be made in the practice of the House which will prevent members from having that entire freedom and frankness in debate which they can only have in the committee rooms—which would deprive them of that interchange of opinion which they can so freely exercise in the committee rooms—it would work a very serious detriment to legislation. I understand that that is the reason of the practice which has prevailed ever since parliamentary law was known in this country.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I understand that is the reason given for the existence of such a practice; but I am satisfied it is a vicious practice and ought not to be pursued. There is nothing good to be gained by it. Every member of the House understands that legislation is throttled in the committees, and that it is absolutely impossible to discuss the questions that are considered in the committee, or the position of gentlemen, what was said by them, and how they voted upon any question on the floor of the House; and with no desire to be offensive I state that the position of many gentlemen on questions in the House is not their position in committee, for they are conscious that their colleagues can not allude to the position or the arguments made by them in the committee.

Therefore the cause of the people is not only throttled, but some members are thwarted in the discharge of what they believe to be their duty to the American people. But if the members of the committee were at liberty in their representative capacity to discuss on the floor of the House the attitude of their colleagues on great public questions, men would then come to understand the necessity of giving more attention in the committee room to proper legislation, or would at least have the cowardice to submit to the sway of correct public opinion.

So far as I am personally concerned, and I do not say this in the spirit of a demagogue, I crave the fullest investigation of my every vote and attitude on each and every question, and I believe that the great body of the House echoes my sentiments. The practice is a bad one, and it should be remedied.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will you allow another interruption?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is it not a fact that a record of every member of the committee on any proposition is kept and that his position before the committee is made public?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. There is a practice of course of keeping the record and of calling the roll and keeping a list of the roll call on the questions presented and considered by the committee, and this record may be accessible to the public. It is not a question arising from party spirit that I allude to. But I think that the attitude of members in the committee when great questions of public importance are considered should be as open as in the House. Their argument, their manner, and their advocacy of any question before the committee should be open to all.

If the committee doors were open to the press, the evil would in a great measure be remedied; and if the members were given the opportunity to allude to the attitude of gentlemen in the committees on this floor, it would be beneficial and all-important on matters of legislation. I, myself, would like to make some remarks at this very moment, if it were within the rule, because I think the American people are entitled to know the exact attitude of their representatives.

One other question, Mr. Chairman, not entirely pertinent to this bill; and, as I say, I hope I will not appear in the attitude of a scold, for I assure gentlemen that no man dislikes to take such a position more than myself, and what I am about to say is intended in no way to reflect upon the presiding officer of this House; but there is a practice that has grown up in Congress that ought to be remedied, and that is the practice of putting men upon committees who have special interests to serve.

I do not think, sir, that it is a reflection upon any member of Congress to say that his desire to serve his immediate constituents often overweighs his obligation to the country. I am no exception to the rule. I am claiming no particular virtue for myself. Doubtless I would be influenced as other gentlemen may be or are; but it is a bad practice to put men upon committees who have industries either in their districts or in their States that have transactions and dealings with the Federal Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just one word more, coming back to the bill. The remarks that I have made have been suggested to some extent by my experience and my thought along the lines of this bill, and my service on the Naval Committee. My colleague from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] stated this morning derisively that some gentlemen had arrived at his conclusion after three months' of service on the Naval Committee. 'I desire to say that so far as I am concerned I confess opaque ignorance upon the armor-plate question and upon the shipbuilding question, the two matters dividing this House.

I know but very little about them, and yet I think without egotism I can say I know as much about them as any man on the committee, unless it be the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS], whose long service on the committee makes him without doubt an authority on all matters pertaining to the Navy. If any of them have arrived at conclusions different from those which I entertain their conclusions are based upon the self-same testimony that I heard, because I attended every meeting of the Committee upon Naval Affairs since I have been placed upon it.

I have no sort of desire to have the House adopt the suggestion that we have made here if you differ with us. I am quite confident that the gentlemen who differ with the minority upon the question of building ships in the navy-yards and upon the question of armor plate are just as patriotic and moved by just as high purposes as we of the minority. It is a question of business and not of politics. It is a question for the solution of the representatives of the American people, and they are to determine what is best for us all. I do not care whether you build ships in the navy-yards or not.

I know that the Bureau of Construction, from the head of it down to every man examined, say that we ought to do so, and I do know that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON], and I am sorry he is not in his place, made a statement this morning that was exceedingly equivocal, and he did not deal fairly with the House in arguing the testimony of the constructors. I invite members of the House to read the printed evidence of the constructors and of Admiral Hichborn before the committee on the shipbuilding question, which I shall not attempt to discuss.

I desire to say that I regret extremely that I am not in an attitude to put in the RECORD a letter which I have received, written me by a gentleman who lives, I believe, in the district of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], and who claims to know about the manufacture of armor. That is all the testimony that I have been able to get possession of during this session, except what is contained in the records and books which are open to everybody. I have asked permission to put that letter in the RECORD, but that permission has not been granted me.

I do not know what it would cost to make a ton of armor, and I do not believe there is a man in the American Government who knows, outside of the workmen in Mr. Carnegie's works and the Bethlehem Iron Works. I do not believe there is a man in this Government who can come anywhere near stating what a ton of armor will cost. I am opposed to the construction of an armor-plate factory, and I am opposed to the construction of ships in the Government navy-yards. I do not see how I can reconcile my positions as a Democrat without straining my conscience a little bit: but I believe when it comes to a question of highway robbery or foregoing my deep-rooted convictions as a Democrat, I would surrender a few of them, and I am driven to take the position that I do upon the armor-plate question, gentlemen, after reading the reports and the evidence at my disposal. I have come to the calm, deliberate conclusion that we were paying from 175 to 200 per cent more than it cost these men to manufacture armor plate.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. SNODGRASS. What about the statement that has been made that there is a patented process that entered into it?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. My dear sir, every man knows that there are various patents, a dozen or more of them, on the process of hardening iron.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Have the present manufacturers of armor plate the exclusive privilege of using that secret process?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. If I were to undertake to go into that, it would be necessary to make a speech on the subject.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I think that is an important question, and I hope somebody will make a speech on it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I have a very serious doubt in my mind whether or not any royalty is paid even by Mr. Carnegie or the Bethlehem Iron Works or by the Government. Some years ago the Government thought we were being gouged, and they undertook to protect the manufacturer of armor plate against a royalty of 2 cents a pound. We have never paid the royalty, but I believe there are some suits yet pending about that, to determine the question. So far we have paid no royalty, and Admiral O'Neil in his testimony said that the manufacture of Krupp plate was not a secret process. If the obligation exists at all, it is a moral and not a legal obligation upon the Government to recognize it.

And in that letter, which I will take the risk of quoting here to some extent, and yet I can not disclose the name, it is stated that the method of making Krupp plate is known; and the man professes to be one of four or five men in the United States who understand its manufacture, and he says it can be manufactured at $100 a ton less than harveyized armor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is useless to ask——

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me just there? The gentleman has referred to a mysterious letter.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. It is not mysterious at all.

Mr. HOPKINS. The point I am trying to get at is this: Unless there is something to prohibit making the letter public by the law, I do not know any authority of the committee or the House to restrain the gentleman from exercising his own judgment in giving this House any information that he has which seems to have had a marked influence on the gentleman in arriving at his conclusions.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. No, Mr. Chairman, it did not have any influence upon me. My conclusions were reached before I received the letter. It is not a mysterious letter. It is simply a letter in answer to a question I asked; and yet it contained one or two sentences that were valuable, and I desired to put them in the RECORD, and wrote to the man and asked his permission to publish it, but he has not given that permission; and while I know of no restraining influence, except that of propriety, it is sufficiently potential for me not to publish it without his permission.

Mr. HOPKINS. I misunderstood the position of the gentleman. I inferred from his remarks that it was some action of the committee that was prohibiting him from giving the House certain information here relating to this subject and which had marked influence upon him. That was the reason of my inquiry.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I was, it seems, unfortunate in my statement in reference to the letter.

Mr. BARBER. Have not these armor manufacturers said to the Government, "If you think we do not pay the royalty, you pay the royalty and we will furnish the armor at $500 a ton?" Have not they said that by letter to the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I suppose they have; but that brings up a still further question. I have no doubt in my mind they, in making that statement, have predicated it on a number of things that we can not undertake to analyze here. I have no doubt the royalty will eventually be divided between the armor-plate factories, whether paid by the Government to Krupp, in Europe, or to one of these armor-plate factories here. There is no question in my mind that an understanding exists between the armor-plate factories not only of the United States, but of the world, and I will go further and say I suspect that a nefarious agreement was made by a man who now wears the uniform of this Government.

Mr. BARBER. Have they not said that they have a definite contract with the Krupps by which they are required to pay in pounds sterling so much per ton, and that, while the thickness of the plate governs the amount of the royalty, it will run from $45 to $50, or it is a little over $50 which they are obliged to pay under their contract?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. That is entirely so; but as I said, Mr. Chairman, an understanding exists in this trust. That very trust may impose this royalty, and it may be eventually divided among the armor-plate factories. It is admitted in the testimony of the president of the Carnegie Company that a trust does exist between the Bethlehem and the Carnegie Iron Works. He testified to it not only before the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House but before the Committee on Naval Affairs of the United States Senate. And they have gone further.

I have in my pocket here a little clipping that I got out of a paper a few days ago, and whether true or not I can not say, but here is a statement taken from the New York World, which I will not take up the time of the House to read, but still perhaps I may be permitted to state its contents. It is a declaration, appearing to be authoritative, that the Cramp shipyards and the Carnegie Steel Company have combined, for what purpose will be apparent to the House. Now, not only does the Bethlehem and Carnegie Company manufacture armor plates, but they have gone further and formed a combination with the most gigantic shipbuilding concern of the United States. Why they have formed that combination will be very apparent, I think, to the members of this House.

One other word. The gentleman from West Virginia said that he did not know there was a lobby combating the suggestion of constructing ships in the Government navy-yards. The impression seems to have gotten abroad that the minority were in favor of the construction of all Government ships in the Government navy-yards. That is not the position of the minority. We simply ask that the three smaller cruisers of 8,000 tons burthen be constructed, one at the Norfolk Navy-Yard, one at the Brooklyn Navy-Yard, and one at Mare Island, and we did that because the constructors said that eventually it would be cheaper for the Government to do so than to construct them by contract. That was our idea.

I started to reply to the position of the gentleman over there. He said he did not feel a lobby on this question. I do not know whether there was a lobby here or not, but I received a copy of a letter addressed to a Republican member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, handed me by a gentleman who declared he was a representative of the Cramps, and that he was here for the purpose of trying to persuade our committee against that idea. The letter was simply an argument against building ships in the navy-yard, and I supposed each member of the committee received a copy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have agreed with the chairman of the committee, acting upon the suggestion of the senior Democrat on the committee, Mr. CUMMINGS, that we would close general debate to-night. I believe there is no one else that desires to say anything.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the general debate on the bill be considered as closed.

Mr. CANNON. We can not do that in committee, can we?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Before debate is closed, Mr. Chairman, I want to be recognized long enough to make a request.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Pending that motion, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask my colleague if we can not have some understanding about the debate on the armor-plate question, the shipbuilding question, and on the Government survey that our friend from Illinois is so much interested in.

Mr. FOSS. I think when we reach those items in the bill we can make some arrangement.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good idea to make it now?

Mr. FOSS. I shall be pleased to make any arrangement which will be satisfactory—say, to have debate for an hour or two on each one of those items which are in dispute.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Speaking for myself, Mr. Chairman, that will be entirely satisfactory, and I think to the members of the minority.

Mr. FOSS. There is no disposition, so far as I am concerned, to cut off anybody from a reasonable discussion of these matters.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am anxious, Mr. Chairman, to say something on the armor-plate question, and if the gentleman is not going to allow reasonable time when the question is reached I would like before general debate is closed to get recognition and say something on the bill. If he is going to allow reasonable time, I would much prefer, if I can get an opportunity, to say it then.

Mr. FOSS. I think the gentleman can have time.

Mr. CANNON. Why not have this understanding—I have frequently made it when I have had charge of appropriation bills, sundry civil and other bills—that as to the time covering the coast survey, the armor plate, and the building of ships in navy-yards, we shall not consider general debate as closed upon those three questions? Then we can agree when we reach them as to the time.

Mr. FOSS. I would much prefer to fix the time now.

Mr. CANNON. Possibly you might fix a longer time than would be wanted. I only make the suggestion. Gentlemen who have spoken to me about the coast-survey matter have said that they would like not longer than an hour and a half or shorter than an hour, as against that provision.

Mr. FOSS. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I am willing to agree that when we reach the ocean and lake survey we have a debate for an hour and a half, one-half of the time to be controlled by——

Mr. CANNON. No, I said an hour and a half against the bill provision.

Mr. FOSS. Well, make it two hours—an hour on each side.

Mr. CANNON. That, under the five-minute rule, so far as I am concerned, would be sufficient.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, that is for the coast survey. I think there ought to be ample time on the armor-plate proposition. There are a good many gentlemen who want to speak on the question who are not on the committee. I regard that as one of the most important propositions that have been debated in this House at this Congress—whether or not the Government shall manufacture its own armor plate.

Mr. RIDGELY. I wish to state, Mr. Chairman, that I would like some time to speak upon the question of making armor plate.

Mr. GAINES. I should like to have some time, too.

Mr. FOSS. I will say to members that I have no doubt there will be ample time for gentlemen to make remarks upon these questions when we reach these provisions. I move that general debate be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. I do not understand that there has been any formal action closing general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. No gentleman is ready to take the floor in general debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that I asked for the floor, if I could not have assurance from the acting chairman of the committee that I should have time upon the armor-plate question.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that we can reach an agreement—that the chairman will give us all the time necessary when we reach those provisions.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will take my friend's assurance as to the ocean and coast survey.

Mr. FOSS. I think the gentleman can take it with perfect safety.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House bill No. 10450 and had come to no resolution thereon.

TREATMENT OF AMERICAN CITIZENS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of March 23, 1900, calling for copies of any and all letters on file in the Department of State from citizens of the United States resident in the South African Republic from January 1, 1899, to the present time, making complaints of treatment by the South African Republic.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 17, 1900.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for three days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. STANLEY W. DAVENPORT, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Timothy A. Allen, Fifty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

HOUSE BILL WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, House bill No. 10449, making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

GOVERNMENT EXHIBITS AT NEW YORK PRINTING EXPOSITION.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report back the joint resolution which I send to the desk, with the recommendation that it pass with amendments. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 235) authorizing the exhibit of Government relics at the New York Printing Exposition from May 2 to June 2, 1900.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to exhibit at the New York Printing Exposition, from May 2 to June 2, 1900, a geometrical scroll machine, and such other articles now in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; also, "a picture of Governor William Allen of Ohio on a saw blade," now in the possession of the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department; also copies of charts of Hell Gate, the Battery, and other New York City points, to be printed from original copperplates now in the possession of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and such other articles in said bureaus as may be of interest to the printing trades.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to exhibit at said exposition medical catalogues, old volumes, works in Russian and other foreign tongues, now in the possession of the Surgeon-General of the Army; also samples of work and manuscripts written on stumps, and so forth, by generals in the war of the rebellion, now in the possession of the Rebellion Records Division of the War Department, and such other articles as may be of interest to the printing trades.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to exhibit at said exposition such general exhibit of patents as may be of interest to the printing trades.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to exhibit at said exposition the old Ben Franklin printing press and such other articles now in the National Museum as may be of interest to the printing trades.

SEC. 5. That all expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution shall be paid by the directors of the New York Printing Exposition under such regulations as shall be adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

On page 1 strike out, in line 4, the words "and directed" and insert "in his discretion."

On page 2 strike out, in line 2, the words "and directed" and insert "in his discretion."

Page 2 strike out, in line 11, the words "and directed" and insert "in his discretion."

Page 2 strike out, in line 15, the words "and directed" and insert "in his discretion."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I would like the Clerk to read the enacting clause again. There may be need of an amendment there.

The enacting clause was again read.

Mr. CANNON. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments which have been read.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have taken part in the general debate on the naval appropriation bill may extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if he will not extend that request so as to embrace those gentlemen who speak under the five-minute rule on the bill?

Mr. FOSS. I have no objection.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the RECORD has been much abused recently by this privilege, I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the objection apply to both requests?

Mr. STEELE. To both requests.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

MEDALS FOR OFFICERS AND MEN OF NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 98) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be struck bronze medals commemorating the naval engagements on the Cuban coast, and to distribute such medals to the officers and men of the ships of the North Atlantic Squadron of the United States, to report a substitute therefor, and as I think there will be no objection to it, I should like to have it passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be read.

The joint resolution (S. R. 115) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to cause bronze medals to be struck and distributed to certain officers and men who participated in the war with Spain, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be struck bronze medals commemorative of the naval and other engagements in the waters of the West Indies and on the shores of Cuba during the war with Spain, and to distribute the same to the officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps who participated in any of said engagements deemed by him of sufficient importance to deserve commemoration: Provided, That officers and men of the Navy or Marine Corps who rendered specially meritorious service, otherwise than in battle, may be rewarded in like manner: And provided further, That any person who may, under the provisions of this act, be entitled to receive recognition in more than one instance shall, instead of a second medal, be presented with a bronze bar, appropriately inscribed, to be attached to the ribbon by which the medal is suspended. And to carry out the provisions of this resolution, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution which has just been read?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine a question regarding it, if I may be permitted. I wish to know if it proposes to cover, as I presume it does, all the sailors and employees of the Navy who were engaged in these particular battles?

Mr. HALE. That is the very object of it.

Mr. WARREN. And it is to be a style of medal especially designed for this purpose?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Unlike the others that the present statute provides for?

Mr. HALE. Yes; it is to be commemorative of this occasion and to be a distinctive medal.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate joint resolution No. 98 will, without objection, be indefinitely postponed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported an amendment authorizing the purchase, at a sum not to exceed $200,000, of the steel floating dry dock belonging to the Government of Spain, now in the harbor of Habana, Cuba, intended to be proposed to the naval appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

JOHN W. WARWICK.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2130) for the relief of the heirs of John W. Warwick, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 2130) entitled "A bill for the relief of the heirs of John W. Warwick," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

ARMY EXPLORATIONS IN ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER. From the Committee on Military Affairs I beg leave to submit a report in response to Senate resolution agreed to December 9, 1897, directing the Committee on Military Affairs "to investigate and report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, the extent to which the Territory of Alaska has been explored by the Army of the United States; and what, if any, aid the Army may be able to lend in opening, protecting, and maintaining the regular lines of communication exclusively within the territory of the United States from tide water to the interior of said territory, and what measures may, with propriety, be adopted to avert hostilities with and to secure the friendly cooperation of the native population of said territory in developing the resources thereof."

This report has been delayed because of the desire to incorporate the results of explorations conducted during the year 1899. The report now made, in addition to the introductory matter, embraces in narrative form the report of the Raymond expedition of 1869; the expedition under Gen. O. O. Howard, of 1875; of Petrof, in 1880; of Schwatka, in 1883; Ray, in 1883; Abercrombie, in 1884; Allen, in 1885; E. Hazard Wells, in 1897–98; Richardson, in 1897–1899; Ray, in 1897–98; Glenn, in 1898; Abercrombie, in 1898; Glenn, in 1899, and Abercrombie, in 1899.

The report will embrace, as I have heretofore suggested, in narrative form, the sum and substance of all the information acquired upon these various expeditions. I submit the report from the Committee on Military Affairs, and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana, in response to a resolution of the Senate, submits a report, which will be printed.

Mr. CARTER. The report consists of the packages here and the introductory matter I have handed to the Secretary.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave to submit a conference report.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator to wait until after the morning business is through.

Mr. CULLOM. I will delay it if the Senator desires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further reports of committees, the introduction of bills is in order.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER. By request, I introduce a bill for the prevention of the denial or abridgment of the right of citizens of the United States to vote on account of color. I am not prepared to advocate the passage of the bill. I ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The bill (S. 4252) for the prevention of the denial or abridgment of the right of citizens of the United States to vote on account of color was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut introduced a bill (S. 4253) to provide for ascertaining the indebtedness of certain Osage Indians to the traders at the Osage Agency, and for making payments upon such indebtedness; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4254) to allot lands of the Osage Reservation in severalty; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LODGE introduced a bill (S. 4255) granting an increase of pension to Frank Smith; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 4256) granting a pension to James H. Thomas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 4257) for the relief of Decatur Hamlin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 4258) relating to rights of way for canals and ditches used for irrigation and other beneficial uses; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LINDSAY introduced a bill (S. 4259) granting an increase of pension to Alice Worthington Winthrop; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RAWLINS introduced a bill (S. 4260) to provide for holding terms of court in the district of Utah; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHOUP introduced a bill (S. 4261) granting a pension to Frances M. Cellar; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DANIEL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 4262) for the relief of the estate of Richard Randall, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4263) for the relief of Mary A. Dinguid; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4264) for the relief of John B. Puryear; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAY introduced a bill (S. 4265) for the relief of Michael Kries; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 4266) relating to the removal of causes from State courts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $350 to Frederick von Baumbach, collector of internal revenue at St. Paul, Minn., said sum being amount deposited for revenue stamps never received by him, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $350 to Frederick von Baumbach, collector of internal revenue at St. Paul, Minn., said sum being amount deposited for revenue stamps never received by him, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART submitted an amendment directing the Secretary of War to make partial payments under contracts now existing with the War Department for the purchase and erection of pneumatic dynamite guns, carriages, etc., and ammunition for the same, intended to be proposed by him to the fortifications appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted an amendment proposing an appropriation of $30,000 to enable the Secretary of the Interior to purchase and place upon the Black Hills Forest Reservation, in South Dakota, a herd of American buffalo, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 for the purpose of rebuilding and enlarging the military post at Fort Meade, S. Dak., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

COLORED AND INDIAN SOLDIERS IN SOLDIERS' HOMES.

Mr. HOAR. I submit a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate of the number of colored and Indian soldiers, or persons partly of African or Indian descent, in the National Soldiers' Homes.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. PETTUS. I should like to hear the resolution read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolution will be agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Alabama wished to have the resolution read again. I should like simply to say that some complaint comes from the Soldiers' Homes to me—I had rather a touching and impressive letter this morning—that the colored soldiers find their life rather hard, as not finding it agreeable to the white soldiers in all cases to treat them on terms of entire equality; and the question occurred to me whether there were enough of them in number to warrant some separate provision for that class of old soldiers. The resolution merely asks for the number of such persons; that is all.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I am not opposing the resolution in the slightest degree, but I want to make a suggestion that may enlarge it. The soldiers have an insane hospital, or at least it is called by that name or intended for that purpose, and it seems to me that the Senator from Massachusetts might benefit mankind if he would enlarge it so as to include the insane asylum. I want these people to have every benefit that can be put upon them if they are worthy soldiers, but I think it is time for Senators to try to yield something to the opinion of mankind in their own States, not going any farther South, and separate these people. They do not live in harmony in the hospitals, even insane people. They do not live in harmony with your soldiers from Maine and from Massachusetts. While I would have them provided for as well as any white soldier on earth, let us consult the comfort of both, and inquire whether it would not be best to give them equal comforts in separate places.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if I may say one word, as the Senator has made a challenge, I do not think the Senate with the present matters before it would desire that either I or the Senator from Alabama should take up this subject this morning without special preparation for full and thorough discussion. I therefore only asked that the Senate might by this resolution be informed of the numbers of these soldiers at the Home and stop there.

But as the Senator has undertaken to administer not exactly a reproof, but an exhortation to me, hoping that I shall not ask for them any more than is granted in my own State, I beg to inform that Senator that in the colleges in Massachusetts and the schools, which I suppose are as good and are filled with as good gentlemen and ladies as are to be found elsewhere, the colored boy or girl takes his place as an equal—equal in the class, equal in studies, equal in the social life of the pupil.

I visited Amherst College a few years ago and was a guest of the distinguished President Seeley, a man famous and honored throughout the Union. The guest invited to meet me was an admirable young Greek scholar, a gentleman who sat by my side, and by the side of the hostess a colored youth from North Carolina. I wish to say that so far as Massachusetts is concerned the Senator's reproof does not apply.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, my only purpose was——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not before the Senate.

Mr. PETTUS. How, sir?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has been agreed to. The Senator can speak by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. PETTUS. The Senator from Massachusetts was not reminded of that fact. I will ask unanimous consent. I do not want to debate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection is made.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the Senator from Massachusetts was on the floor and addressing the Chair when the Chair declared that the resolution was passed.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I am not going to debate any such subject now or at any future time. I leave that to the Senator from Massachusetts. But my only purpose was to get him to enlarge his resolution so as to include the insane asylum when he is asking for this information; that is all.

Mr. HOAR. I will consent to that modification. I ask unanimous consent that the insane asylum may be added, if there be a national insane asylum. I did not know that there was one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution as modified is, without objection, agreed to.

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask leave to introduce a bill.

Mr. SEWELL. Has the inquiry in relation to the Soldiers' Home gone over? I did not happen to be in the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has.

Mr. SEWELL. The Senator objected to it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator object to having it read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been agreed to twice.

Mr. CHANDLER. A motion to reconsider is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which the resolution was agreed to will be reconsidered, and the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask for its reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate of the number of colored and Indian soldiers, or persons partly of African or Indian descent, in the National Soldiers' Homes and national insane asylums.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to it, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, without objection, is agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF NOOKSACK RIVER, WASHINGTON.

Mr. FOSTER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be directed to cause a survey to be made and an estimate submitted of the cost of dredging and otherwise improving the mouth of the Nooksack River, to the end that during the freshets the water of said river may be enabled to pass freely into the waters of Puget Sound without overflowing the surrounding country. Should a further examination prove that it is not practicable to remove the accumulated débris from the mouth of said river the Secretary of War is hereby directed to submit estimates of the cost of opening a new channel for the mouth of said river.

WAR-REVENUE RECEIPTS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit a resolution for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to communicate to the Senate, at the earliest practicable day, a statement showing the aggregate amount of revenue, since the war-revenue law went into operation, derived from stamps on notes, bank checks, insurance policies, leases, mortgages, telegrams, express shipments, and medicinal preparations, each item to be stated separately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. Without objection, it is agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution be read again.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HOAR. I think it would be well to have separately stated also the receipts from the succession to estates. I move to add that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to that modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire modifies his resolution as follows:

Mr. HALE. Would not the Senator also add the word "deeds?"

Mr. GALLINGER. "Deeds" ought to be in, Mr. President. I will accept any amendment enlarging the scope of the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Why not include in a general order each separate source under the stamp or other excise?

Mr. GALLINGER. My purpose was to get information concerning the revenue derived from what may be called stamp taxes, and I think it ought to be confined to that, so far as my purpose will be conserved. If Senators desire to get information regarding matters of taxation outside of the use of revenue stamps, I think another resolution ought to be offered for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SPOONER. I ask to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read once more.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not hear it.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to communicate to the Senate, at the earliest practicable day, a statement showing the aggregate amount of revenue, since the war-revenue law went into operation, derived from stamps on notes, bank checks, insurance policies, deeds, leases, mortgages, telegrams, express shipments, successions of estates, and medicinal preparations, each item to be stated separately.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to amend by inserting after the word "preparations" the words "and beer."

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think the resolution might as well go over; and if I may be permitted to occupy one minute, I will state my reason. Of course there is a desire that the war-revenue tax shall be amended. If that subject is to be taken up, everybody and every business and every interest that had additional taxes put upon it will wish to be considered and to be relieved from those taxes. Therefore, if we are going to get this information, I think it ought to extend to all the subjects which were embraced in that law.

As I heard the resolution read, there is no reference to the amount derived from brokers' sales, and a variety of sources from which we derive revenue are not included there. If we are going to get that information, so as to lay the foundation for intelligent action, we ought to have the revenue from all sources.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, of course the resolution will go over if objection be made, but I simply want to restate my position, that I desire for certain purposes data concerning the revenue derived from the use of stamps, and I still think that there ought to be no objection to passing this resolution and permitting me to have the information that I desire for purposes which I do not care to state; and then if Senators want information on the general subject, let them introduce another resolution. However, I care nothing particularly about it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the objection.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will withdraw my objection if the Senator from New Hampshire feels that he ought to have this information, and another resolution can be presented.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it go over. I am perfectly willing that it shall go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from New Hampshire now says that he is willing that it shall go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and it goes over under the rule.

PRINTING OF PORTO RICAN ACT.

Mr. FORAKER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed 3,000 additional copies of the act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes" (Public No. 60), approved April 12, 1900, and that the same be placed in the document room of the Senate.

COMMISSIONED NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the Senate, first, what was the total number of commissioned naval officers on the 31st day of December, 1899; second, the number on shore duty; and, third, the number on leave of absence or on furlough, or under orders other than to sea or shore duty; and also giving the above information as to each grade and class of officers in the Navy.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 235) authorizing the exhibit of Government relics at the New York Printing Exposition from May 2 to June 2, 1900, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 17th instant, approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 77) authorizing the printing of a special edition of the Yearbook of the United States Department of Agriculture for 1899.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. TURLEY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask that that order be temporarily laid aside in order that I may ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 5485.

TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

Mr. CULLOM. I sent to the desk some time ago a conference report which I should like to have laid before the Senate before any other business is taken up, if I may have it done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois presents a conference report.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report of the committee of conference, but was interrupted by—

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I should like very much to have this conference report printed in the RECORD and go over until to-morrow. I therefore ask that that may be done.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course if the Senate desires to have the report printed——

Mr. PETTIGREW. Simply in the RECORD. That is all.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose I have no right to object to the request, and shall not do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] asks that the report of the conference committee on the Hawaiian bill may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. PETTIGREW. And also as a document.

Mr. CULLOM. If the report goes over, I should like also to have the bill printed as it has been agreed upon, so that Senators can see exactly what it is.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is right.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I simply want the information in the easiest possible way.

Mr. CULLOM. That will be the best way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] as it has been modified by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

Section 1, line 3, after the word "Hawaii," insert the words "in force."

Section 4, line 5, after the word "States," insert the words "resident in the Hawaiian Islands."

Section 4, line 6, strike out the words "in the Hawaiian Islands" and insert in lieu thereof the word "there."

Section 5, line 1, strike out all after the word "That" to and including the word "provided."

And the House agree to the same.

S. M. CULLOM,
H. C. LODGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. S. KNOX,
R. R. HITT,
JOHN A. MOON,
Managers on the part of the House.

RELINQUISHMENT OF SELECTED LANDS IN WYOMING.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5485) providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABANDONED PROPERTY IN INSURRECTIONARY DISTRICTS.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 602.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill (S. 602) to revive and amend an act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and acts amendatory thereof——

Mr. HALE. I must object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. MONEY. I ask for information. Have I the right to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill? If so, I should like to move to take it from the Calendar.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution touching the election case from the State of Pennsylvania is the regular business of the Senate by unanimous consent, and by reason of that unanimous consent the Chair would hardly feel at liberty to hold that a motion could be made to displace it.

Mr. MONEY. I did not understand that the Senatorial case from Pennsylvania was before the Senate. I thought we were still in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That case is before the Senate until 2 o'clock, when, by the same unanimous-consent agreement, the Philippine bill will be the unfinished business.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the pending resolution be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3419, known as the Alaska bill.

Mr. MONEY. I object to that.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Is it the ruling of the Chair that nothing can be taken up except by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hardly feels at liberty to rule touching a unanimous-consent agreement; but the unanimous-consent agreement was that the election case from Pennsylvania should be continually before the Senate, with the exception of the then unfinished business, which was the Porto Rican bill, appropriation bills, and also the bill reported from the Committee on the Philippine Islands. That was the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That the measures mentioned by the Chair have the right of way, the right to be considered; then, if none of these are presented, the Quay case has the right of way if anybody wishes to be heard upon it; but if nobody wishes to be heard, then I think the unanimous consent would be understood to mean that the business of the Senate would proceed in its regular order.

The Quay case simply has the right to be considered if anybody desires to make any remarks upon it; but if nobody wishes to take it up for discussion, and none of these other matters, which were especially excepted, are to be presented, then it seems to me that the regular business of the Senate might be proceeded with and any motion might be made to proceed to the consideration of any other question pending the Quay case, upon which nobody chooses to make remarks at this time. It seems to me the motion of the Senator from Mississippi that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of a special bill on the Calendar would not displace the pending business; but if taken up by the Senate it would be with the distinct understanding that if at any time, even while that question was up, any Senator chose to speak on the Quay case, he would have the right to do so; or if any of the other matters which were set aside were presented, they would come up for consideration; otherwise we should be in the attitude of having it understood that nothing whatever could be done in the Senate except by unanimous consent while this matter is pending, which I think was never intended.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] to take that view the other day when this question arose in the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

I should like the privilege of saying to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] that the bill which he proposes to take up will lead to a very long debate; and this is not an opportune time, it seems to me, to move to take it up, even if a motion to take it up be in order. It has not been ascertained that Senators do not wish to speak to-day on the Pennsylvania case. I hope Senators will so speak. At all events, I trust the Senator from Mississippi will withdraw his motion. I do not care to get into a discussion of the meaning of this unanimous-consent agreement. I hope the Senator will withhold his motion until some more convenient time; otherwise it will certainly be antagonized.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from Mississippi withdraw his motion?

Mr. MONEY. No; I do not.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator's motion prevail, the Senate has determined to take that bill up and has made it the business before the Senate. It will then, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] says, be debated at length. That is not a bill that will be permitted to go through either by unanimous consent or on a short debate. It has excited the attention of the Senate. The attempt has been made here two or three times to get a day fixed when the bill should be voted upon; and the Senator may as well understand that this measure, whenever it does get up before the Senate, will consume considerable of the time of the Senate; and clearly, if taken up now, that will be the end of the Quay case so far as its being the unfinished business is concerned.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I quite understand the objections entertained by Senators on the other side of the Chamber to the consideration of this bill; and with all due deference to my friend from New Hampshire, I do not think that he believes an opportune time will ever come for its consideration.

While I am perfectly willing, according to the general-consent agreement, that the Quay case shall be considered as the unfinished business, yet if nobody considers it worth while to take time to address the Senate upon it now, I do not see why the debate on the bill I have moved to take up should not begin. I do not believe the debate will be as long as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] thinks. I do not think that many Senators will care to debate it.

For my part, I am ready to begin the debate to-day or at any other time; and I think I can show to the Senate that a very effective appeal can be made to the sense of justice of both sides of this Chamber for the passage of this measure of relief. I think I can show plainly that the Supreme Court has already made decisions in a number of cases that this was a trust fund, and that it was never intended by the original act that the owners should be divested of their rights of proprietorship. It is contrary to the law of nations and would put the United States in the attitude of unjustly depriving people of their property in violation of the uniform practice of all the civilized nations of the world, and contrary to the principles laid down by Dr. Leiber. I can also show that the Supreme Court not only has decided that it was not the intention of Congress to divest these people of their property, but that it was a trusteeship, and that the only thing lacking is a tribunal before which the cestui que trust can prove his share in the distributive fund.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask a question of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator if he expects a vote on this measure to-day, or merely desires to have it called up for the sake of making an argument, the substance of which he has just been stating, between now and 2 o'clock, when the Philippine matter will come up?

Mr. MONEY. In reply to the Senator, I should be very glad, of course, to get a vote upon the bill as early as possible. If Senators wish to be heard upon it, of course they have a right to be heard, and I shall be glad to hear them; but I should like to have this bill put in an attitude where it can be considered by the Senate, and where the facts and the law applying to the case can be fully considered.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps I may suggest something that will be satisfactory to the Senator and the Senate, and that is, if the Senator is ready with the constitutional argument which he has just stated he wishes to address to the Senate at some time, that by unanimous consent he make that argument between now and 2 o'clock, when the matter will be laid aside and the Philippine question will come up. If he will not undertake to press the bill to a vote at present——

Mr. MONEY. I can not press it to a vote.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has been already informed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that there will be earnest and strenuous argument in opposition to this measure, and of course every Senator knows it is a matter about which I believe the Supreme Court of the United States was once evenly divided, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. BERRY. No. If the Senator from Mississippi will permit me, I think the Senator confuses this matter with the cotton-tax cases.

Mr. HOAR. That may be.

Mr. BERRY. This has no relation to the cotton-tax cases?

Mr. MONEY. None whatever.

Mr. BERRY. The Supreme Court decided that this property belonged to individuals. I understand the court was equally divided upon the question of the cotton tax. This, however, is a different matter.

Mr. HOAR. Then I was mistaken.

Mr. MONEY. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senate will allow the Senator from Mississippi to make his speech; and then the matter will go over, of course, at 2 o'clock, as it will anyhow if taken up by a vote of the Senate. It is a pity to make so doubtful a proceeding in opposition to the unanimous-consent agreement, which the Senator from Mississippi is as certain to regard as any other Senator. I know how scrupulous and careful he is on all such matters which involve personal arrangements in the Senate.

Mr. MONEY. Thank you.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me, therefore, that perhaps the Senator might make his speech now, and then at 2 o'clock the Philippine question will come up, and that will get rid of the whole question.

Mr. CARTER. I will suggest, Mr. President, that we are in the midst of the consideration of the Alaskan code bill, a very important piece of legislation, of widespread public interest, and of vital interest to the district of Alaska.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him right there. He is mistaken. We are in the midst of the consideration of the Pennsylvania resolution. [Laughter.] I ask the Senator from Mississippi to kindly wait until we ascertain whether any Senator wishes to speak on that resolution. If no Senator desires to speak, I shall ask that the resolution may go over, under the unanimous-consent agreement, until after the routine morning business to-morrow, and then the way will be open to any contention which the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Montana choose to maintain.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, if the Senators who oppose this measure will agree to fix a day for its consideration, and give as ample a range for discussion as they see fit, I shall be very glad to consent to that. I certainly do not want the discussion curtailed in any way; and I am quite sure when Senators understand the measure they will be inclined to favor the passage of the bill. If, however, I can not get that consent, I should prefer, with the indulgence of the Senate, to go on now.

Mr. BERRY (to Mr. MONEY). Ask that the bill be taken up in the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senate will give me consent to have the bill go over until to-morrow morning, and that it then be taken up in the morning hour, I shall be very glad to have that arrangement; or I am ready to go on now.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, my understanding is that objection was made to the present consideration of the bill presented by the Senator from Mississippi; and in view of the fact that at the time the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business yesterday evening we were in the midst of a discussion of a certain proposed amendment to the Alaskan bill, in order to facilitate the transaction of business, I ask the Senate to resume that discussion now, and attempt to-day, if possible, and if not, to-morrow, to dispose of the Alaskan code bill. It is quite possible it will take some time for it to be matured into an act of Congress even if passed by the Senate at an early date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asked unanimous consent to take up a bill, and objection was made. He then made a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. The Chair did not rule whether or not the motion was in order, because it is not, in the opinion of the present Presiding Officer, his province to determine what the Senate means by a unanimous-consent agreement. If the Senator insists on making the motion, the Chair will feel obliged to submit the question to the Senate whether or not the motion is now in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I make the suggestion to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], who are both upon the floor, that the motion is in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. As I understand the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, it is to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him, not interfering in any way with the rights of the Quay case, which has its rights under the unanimous-consent agreement, or any of the other cases mentioned in that unanimous-consent agreement; but for the consideration of the bill, preserving the rights of all of those things already agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I do not suppose the Senator himself thinks that he could make any such motion as that.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then, if that be the case, nothing can go on except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. That was what you said the other day.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not think I said so.

Mr. HALE. There can be only one motion, which is to take the bill up; which would, of course, put the other measures out of the way.

Mr. CHANDLER. And that would be in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to ask if there can not be an understanding with the Senator from Maine, the Senator from New Hampshire, and the Senator from Mississippi that some day be fixed in the early future, some morning hour, when this bill shall be taken up and considered, not for a final vote, but to be considered after the disposition of the routine morning business?

Mr. CHANDLER. Allow me to say that the unanimous-consent agreement expires on Tuesday next.

Mr. BERRY. Well, I suggest that a time be fixed subsequent to that day.

Mr. MONEY. What I desire is a vote. I am willing to have the discussion go on so far as the Senators who oppose the bill see proper to maintain it. I do not want anything that is unreasonable. I am perfectly willing to risk this case before the Senate upon its merits; but I do want to have the debate begun on it and for it to have an established place, so that it will be secure at least of settlement by a vote of the Senate. I do not want it put off morning after morning by objections being made. I repeat, that I shall be very glad if Senators who object to the bill will agree to fix a day or suggest a day for its consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will agree that next Wednesday, in the morning hour, the Senator may move to take up the bill.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up at that time.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, before proceeding further, I want to suggest that this is a bill which has been reported from the Committee on Claims and that there are members of that committee who have desired further information, and letters have been sent to the Department in relation to it. While I do not wish to delay the matter at all, I do not think we shall hurry it by fixing at this time a very near date for its consideration, because, I think, when the consideration of the bill is proceeded with, it will be necessary to get information of which we are not now in possession.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator will permit me, if he will look in the papers he will find that the letters to which he has referred have been answered some time ago.

Mr. WARREN. That is true to some extent, but there are still further inquiries touching the bill, or some portions of it, which the information received does not cover; and so I think the Senator will agree with me we should have that information. I do not inject this statement in order to have the bill laid aside, but I do not think we should have a unanimous-consent agreement to proceed to a final vote on it for some time yet.

Mr. BERRY. Nobody proposes a final vote, but we want a time fixed for the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi make a motion?

Mr. MONEY. I make a motion to take up the bill now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill which he has mentioned.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope, if there is any question about the effect of that motion, that it will not be made. I believe that these unanimous-consent agreements ought to be observed with the utmost good faith, and that there should be no appearance of their violation in the slightest degree. I for one am not willing to be a party to any violation of any such agreement at any time; but the construction of these unanimous-consent agreements which is contended for by Senators on the other side, if correct, it seems to me is a good argument why there should never be unanimous-consent agreements hereafter. If, while one of the unanimous-consent agreements is pending, nothing else whatever can be taken up except by unanimous consent, then I do not believe that any more unanimous-consent agreements ought to be made; but if a single Senator believes that the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, if adopted, would displace the unanimous-consent agreement, or that it will be in any sense a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement, I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not make the motion, because I very much prefer to lose whatever right we may have, or even fail to press a bill which ought to be passed, rather than to have any appearance of violating a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Chair, if I may be permitted, whether if this motion to take up the bill should pass the Senate, it would not displace the Quay case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HOAR. And whether the Chair would not be obliged to rule that the unanimous-consent agreement was destroyed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly the Chair would be obliged to so rule.

Mr. HOAR. The statement of the Chair answers the question of the Senator from Arkansas, that the Chair would be obliged to so rule.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then, is the ruling of the Chair that a motion can not be made that, subject to all the rights of the Quay case, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Mississippi?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not disposed to rule on the question of whether or not such a motion would be in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement. He would submit that question to the Senate. It is not the province of the Chair to construe unanimous-consent agreements.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The question I asked of the President of the Senate was whether the motion made by the Senator from Mississippi, and made subject to all the rights of the Quay case under the unanimous-consent agreement, would then displace that case if adopted by the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No. If so adopted, in the opinion of the Chair, it would not.

Mr. MONEY. It would not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not if that case was excepted from its operation.

Mr. MONEY. That is my understanding of the case.

Mr. CHANDLER. A conditional motion of that kind to take up a bill is certainly not in order. A bill is either up or it is not up. It is not up under conditions to be specified in the motion.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Quay case is up in that way now.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. MONEY. Pending the motion, I will ask for the consideration of the bill to which I have referred on next Wednesday morning immediately after the routine morning business.

Mr. HALE. The bill is a very important one, and it involves the taking of a very great amount of money from the Treasury.

Mr. MONEY. About $5,000,000.

Mr. HALE. I am not going to discuss its merits, but only to give the reasons why I shall object to anything of the kind. In the present condition of the business of the Senate, with many important matters looming before us which must needs be passed by Congress before we adjourn, and with the general desire that we shall get away from here by the 1st of June, which I believe to be a clearly possible thing, I do not think that this bill is one of the class that should be taken from the Calendar and made special by agreement as to when a vote shall be taken upon it.

Mr. BERRY. There is no proposition to take a vote, but only to consider the bill.

Mr. HALE. That is the same thing. It is a special order, and puts other things aside that are more important. With the feeling I have about it, and believing that the bill itself, if allowed to pass, will subject the Treasury in the end to a drain of more than $150,000,000, I must oppose it. I object to the proposition.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator permit me to say a word to him before he takes his seat?

Mr. HALE. I was only stating my objection. I have not the floor.

Mr. MONEY. This is not a door to any further claim upon the Treasury. It is the distribution of a trust fund, and it has no relation whatever to the refunding of the cotton tax; it has no relation whatever to the cotton captured by the Union Army, called Confederate cotton. It relates to that which was captured under the act of 1863, in which it was declared that it was not the intention of the United States to deprive people of that class of property. It is simply a fund which the Supreme Court of the United States said was a trust fund, and which can not be distributed because there is no tribunal which can make a distribution of the trust fund to the cestui que trusts.

The Senator must not be alarmed at the idea that it will lead to any further consequences. This is a thing of itself; and I shall propose to strike out one clause of the bill that would seem to imply that somebody could bring a claim under this bill for any surplus which may remain in the Treasury. The fund is only $4,992,000, as has been shown by reports of the Secretary of the Treasury. So I hope the Senator from Maine will not entertain the idea that this is preliminary suit which is to lay the inducement for further claims upon the Government, for it does nothing of the kind. It is a distribution of a trust fund.

Mr. TELLER. This bill was reported from the Committee on Claims and intended to cover only cases where the Government had seized cotton and put the proceeds into the Treasury.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. All property.

Mr. TELLER. But it seems to me, on examining it, that the language is broader than the committee intended. The committee have reported this bill once before, but whether in the same language or not I do not know.

Mr. MONEY. It has been reported several times.

Mr. TELLER. The bill will need some amendments. The committee proposed, and we reported the bill upon the theory, that it did not apply to any abandoned property except the cotton seized under the abandoned-property act and the money paid into the Treasury. This is for the purpose of determining who are the owners of it, and that is all.

Mr. MONEY. That is all.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I am sure he does not expedite matters at all by insisting on bringing up the bill now. The chairman has sent to the Treasury Department for information which I think is in the interest of the bill. I am myself in favor of the passage of the bill as the committee intended it, but certainly we must have that information here before we proceed, in the interest of the bill. The Senator does not expedite matters at all by insisting now upon taking up the bill; and I speak as a friend of the measure. I hope the Senator will let this pass until we get the information, and we will try then to get the bill up. I believe the bill can be brought up with the information we shall have and passed here with little or no opposition; but it must be somewhat amended, and we must have some information, I think, to disabuse the minds of Senators who, like the Senator from Maine, think it may take a hundred million dollars. It will take somewhere between five and six million dollars, I suppose.

Mr. MONEY. Four million nine hundred and ninety-two thousand dollars.

Mr. TELLER. Somewhere in that neighborhood. I think we can guard it so that it will take nothing except where the Government has got the proceeds of the property of people which it ought not to hold. I hope the Senator will let the matter pass for the present.

Mr. MONEY. Considering what the Senator from Colorado has said and his friendship for this measure, I am willing that it shall go by now in order that Senators may be informed; and I hope they will avail themselves of every opportunity to inform themselves before the matter comes up again.

Mr. President, I desire to give notice, if I am in order, that after the usual business of the morning hour on next Wednesday I shall call up this matter.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the business before the Senate be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3419, known as the Alaskan bill. Is there objection?

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no objection, unless a Senator wishes to speak this morning on the Pennsylvania case.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question, the Chair believes, is on the modified amendment offered——

Mr. CARTER. The modified amendment has not been offered. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH].

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I wish the Senate would realize the importance of maintaining the integrity of the mining laws of the United States. The laws now upon the statute book are the result of much labor, experience, and consultation. They have not been amended since 1872. The people of a vast region of the United States in Alaska understand these laws. Previous to 1872 I gave the best years of my life to assisting in perfecting them and making them suitable to the conditions of mining. They grew up originally from miners' rules and regulations, made by the miners themselves.

Gold mines were discovered in California in 1848. No legislation was had by Congress until July, 1866. In 1851, at the second session of the legislature of California, a provision was incorporated in the practice act by Judge Field, providing that the rules and regulations of the miners established and enforced might be offered in evidence and, when not in conflict with the laws of the United States or of the State, should govern the decision of the action.

Mr. HOAR. Was that in the United States law or in that of the State of California?

Mr. STEWART. The State of California. The United States passed no law until 1866. Under this policy of nonaction by the Government of the United States, the miners continued making their rules and regulations. The courts passed upon them, and at the time we legislated there were reports of mining decisions of the States and Territories comprising probably a hundred volumes. The principal part of these decisions was construing the miners' rules and regulations. A perfect system was established.

I came here in the winter of 1864-65 and commenced to advocate legislation to ratify these rules. The property of a million men rested upon these rules; in fact, the whole community depended upon them. The court had decided in a case which I argued in February, 1865, that the miners had acquired property which gave the court jurisdiction under these rules and regulations and that they could not close their eyes to what had occurred. The Supreme Court held that the courts had jurisdiction, notwithstanding the statutes of the United States declared the parties to be trespassers.

In July, 1866, an act was passed recognizing these rules and regulations, and confirming the title to the mines according to the regulations made by the miners themselves. The statute also made provision for obtaining patents. But the statute was inadequate. There had not been sufficient experience, and we commenced then to work out a system that would be satisfactory to the Government and satisfactory to the miners. I introduced a bill at every session and sent it out to the miners to be considered by them. We not only had a mining committee, but we agreed among ourselves on a committee of all the Delegates from the mining Territories and Senators and Representatives in both Houses from all the mining States. We pursued this for four years, considering every question in all its bearings, having all the Delegates and all the Senators and Representatives interested present in addition to the mining committee. At the the end of four years the act of 1872 was passed, and is contained in the Revised Statutes.

Section 2319 is as follows:

All valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and purchase, and the lands in which they are found to occupation and purchase by citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such, under regulations prescribed by law, and according to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same are applicable and not inconsistent with the laws of the United States.

Section 2324 is as follows:

The miners of each mining district may make regulations not in conflict with the laws of the United States or with the laws of the State or Territory in which the district is situated, governing the location, manner of recording, amount of work necessary to hold possession of a mining claim, subject to the following requirements: The location must be distinctly marked on the ground, so that its boundaries can be readily traced. All records of mining claims hereafter made shall contain the name or names of the locators, the date of the location, and such a description of the claim or claims located by reference to some natural object or permanent monument as will identify the claim.

On each claim located after the 10th of May, 1872, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year. On all claims located prior to the 10th day of May, 1872, $10 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made by the 10th day of June, 1874, and each year thereafter, for each 100 feet in length along the vein until a patent has been issued therefor; but where such claims are held in common, such expenditure may be made upon any one claim; and upon a failure to comply with these conditions the claim or mine upon which such failure occurred shall be open to relocation in the same manner as if no location of the same had ever been made: Provided, That the original locators, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, have not resumed work upon the claim after failure and before such location.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And the law has not been changed since?

Mr. STEWART. It has never been changed since, and there has never been a serious proposition to change it until now. No radical change has been made in the law.

Mr. President, I suggest the want of a quorum. I am not going to talk on this subject without a quorum present. I shall suggest that point every time the Senate is thin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCOMAS in the chair). The Senator from Nevada suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon,	Deboe,	Lodge,	Sewell,
Bard,	Fairbanks,	McComas,	Shoup,
Bate,	Foraker,	McMillan,	Simon,
Berry,	Foster,	Martin,	Spooner,
Burrows,	Gallinger,	Mason,	Stewart,
Carter,	Gear,	Perkins,	Taliaferro,
Chandler,	Hansbrough,	Pettus,	Teller,
Clark, Wyo.	Hawley,	Platt, Conn.	Turley,
Clay,	Heitfeld,	Proctor,	Turner,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Quarles,	Vest,
Culberson,	Kean,	Rawlins,	Warren,
Daniel,	Kenney,	Ross,	Wellington,
Davis,	Lindsay,	Scott,	Wetmore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having responded to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Nevada will proceed.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, it is a consolation to me to know that there has never been a complaint made of any law that has been passed with regard to mines. It never has been charged that one man's property was taken and given to another. On the contrary, such care was taken as to receive the general consent, and that general consent has been continued.

The senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and I tried for two or three sessions to find a satisfactory method to obviate some objections to the law, and gave it up. We thought it was better to let it alone, making no further effort in that line.

There is no good reason assigned for these radical changes or for taking this business out of the hands of the Committee on Mines and Mining and transferring it to the Committee on Territories or the Committee on Public Lands or to individual Senators, when no explanation can be made, when it can not be considered at all. None of these amendments which have been put forward here have been considered. You can not get a quorum to listen to a discussion of the question. No one will know anything about it. You can not have these matters considered as they were considered before. There was no subject as to which the people were equally taken into the confidence of Congress as they were on this subject, and that confidence has not been misplaced. All controversies respecting mining claims were turned over to the courts. If they had been brought here, there would have been any amount of scandal, but in this very law it provides what shall be done. When an adverse claim is made, it must be turned over to the courts.

This feature of the act has done more to work justice than can be conceived. It was a long and tedious fight to reach it; but the matter was allowed to wait, and was finally satisfactorily arranged by a proper committee, who were diligently at work on it for years.

I will read section 2326:

Where an adverse claim is filed during the period of publication, it shall be upon oath of the person or persons making the same, and shall show the nature, boundaries, and extent of such adverse claim, and all proceedings, except the publication of notice and making and filing of the affidavit thereof, shall be stayed until the controversy shall have been settled or decided by a court of competent jurisdiction or the adverse claim waived. It shall be the duty of the adverse claimant, within thirty days after filing his claim, to commence proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction, to determine the question of the right of possession, and prosecute the same with reasonable diligence to final judgment; and a failure so to do shall be a waiver of his adverse claim.

After such judgment shall have been rendered, the party entitled to the possession of the claim, or any portion thereof, may, without giving further notice, file a certified copy of the judgment roll with the register of the land office, together with the certificate of the surveyor-general that the requisite amount of labor has been expended or improvements made thereon, and the description required in other cases, and shall pay to the receiver $5 per acre for his claim, together with the proper fees, whereupon the whole proceedings and the judgment roll shall be certified by the register to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and a patent shall issue thereon for the claim, or such portion thereof as the applicant shall appear, from the decision of the court, to rightly possess.

If it appears from the decision of the court that several parties are entitled to separate and different portions of the claim, each party may pay for his portion of the claim, with the proper fees, and file the certificate and description by the surveyor-general, whereupon the register shall certify the proceedings and judgment roll to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as in the preceding case, and patents shall issue to the several parties according to their respective rights. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the alienation of the title conveyed by a patent for a mining claim to any person whatever.

He can sell it to any person whatever, whether citizen or alien.

Now, under this arrangement the local courts have decided these disputes, and remember that they have been doing that both before and since the passage of this law. It is now fifty-two years since miners commenced exercising these privileges, and you have a Committee on Mines, composed of very respectable Senators, who are able to act upon these matters, and they have time to deliberate if a bill is introduced and sent to them for consideration. I will read the names of the members of the Committee on Mines and Mining:

WILLIAM M. STEWART, of Nevada; MARCUS A. HANNA, of Ohio; JOSEPH SIMON, of Oregon; CLARENCE D. CLARK, of Wyoming; NATHAN B. SCOTT, of West Virginia; BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN, of South Carolina; HENRY HEITFELD, of Idaho; WILLIAM A. CLARK, of Montana; MARION BUTLER, of North Carolina.

They were selected with a view, as far as practicable, to securing men who had some knowledge of the subject, and we are ready at any time to consider a bill if the mining laws need amendment.

With regard to the alleged urgency for passing this unjust amendment it is said that Laplanders and Japanese and everybody else are robbing the country of these mines and shutting out American citizens. In the first place, the prospectors for mines, who take chances in mining, have been very successful in the last five years, and the result is the production of a thousand millions of gold, to which the prosperity of the country is indebted. If there had been no prospectors for mines, or if the prospectors had not been successful, the conditions would have been such that the gold men themselves would not have dared to present the bill which was passed. Conditions would have been very hard; money would have been very scarce.

We never contended that the material gold or the material silver was consequential. It was the quantity of legal-tender money which made the difference between good and bad times, and these miners, who are real benefactors, are abused and slandered by Senators. They are called Lapps and Japs and denounced as aliens in face of the fact that they have declared their intention to become citizens. The fact that they discovered these mines and added to the prosperity of the country is denounced as a crime. Never before has there been such a flood of gold as the hardy prospectors have furnished in the last four years. There is no truth in the charge that the country has been overrun by Lapps or Japs. Sheldon Jackson gives us an account of the Laplanders who were brought to Alaska by the War Department to manage and raise reindeer. I read from his report, Senate Document No. 34, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, page 46:

NATURALIZATION OF THE LAPPS.

As an evidence of the purpose of the Norwegians and Lapps recently brought over from Lapland to become permanent citizens, the following persons have taken out their first naturalization papers: Magnusi Kjeldsberg, Johan Eira, Wilhelm Basi, Lauritz Stephansen, Johan Hilmar Hansen, Karl Johan Sacariasen, Ole M. Rapp, Alfred Hermansen, Ole Olsen Bar, Jeremias Abrahamsen, Isak Johannesen Hatta, Isak Salamonsen Nakkila, Per Andersen, Samuel Johannesen Balto, Nils Persen Sara, Nils Klemetsen, Lauritz Larsen, Otto M. Leinan, Hans Samuelsen, Ole G. Berg, Thoralf Kjeldberg, Peder Berg, Ole Johansen Stenfjeld, Karl Ove Suhr, Japeth Lindeberg, Ole Krogh, and Johan Petter Stalogargo.

The Lapps are well satisfied with their new home, and promise to make a very valuable and important addition to the population of Alaska and the development of its resources.

In my estimation, next to the discovery of gold, the most important event, commercially, in the history of Alaska during this year is the importation of this colony of Lapps. Experience is rapidly demonstrating that the only possible efficient transportation service in Alaska must be through the use of reindeer, and this necessitates the trained and expert drivers of reindeer found among the civilized Lapps and Finns. The 68 men that were brought over by this expedition are all picked men and expect to be permanent settlers of Alaska. They hope ultimately to have herds of their own, and raise and train reindeer to sell to the transportation companies. Their success will naturally attract others of their people, and render permanent the establishment of the reindeer industry in Alaska.

In this connection I make acknowledgments of the assistance rendered in the movement of the Lapps and reindeer by Brig. Gen. Henry C. Merriam, U. S. A., commanding the Department of the Columbia; also to Capt. W. W. Robinson, jr., U. S. A., at Seattle; Capt. B. Eldridge, U. S. A.; Capt. D. L. Brainard, U. S. A.; Capt. William R. Abercrombie, U. S. A.; Lieut. W. S. Graves, U. S. A., and especially to my associate, Capt. D. B. Devore, U. S. A., who shared with me in the perplexities, difficulties, and hardships encountered in Lapland.

There is no evidence whatever that there is a single Japanese in all Alaska. The pretense that foreigners are crowding out native-born citizens is simply false.

Another equally false pretense is made as an excuse for radical legislation against foreigners. It is said that our people have been treated badly by Canadian authorities and we must retaliate; that we must pass some severe laws. A greater mistake never occurred. In the first place, the Canadian government have treated American citizens precisely as they have treated their own citizens, with one exception, and that they are rectifying. They are desirous of having reciprocal benefits with us in this country, and they have manifested it. I have a correspondence with them and the State Department here to show the condition of feeling there. The statutes of Canada relating to mining I called attention to before, but I want to do so again in this connection.

STATUTES OF CANADA RELATING TO MINING.

Laws of Canada, 1898, English edition, under the head of "Orders in council," etc., page xxxix, regulations governing placer mining in the Yukon Northwest Territories; title, "Interpretation:"

Free miner shall mean a male or female over the age of 18, but not under that age, or joint-stock company, named in and lawfully possessed of a valid existing free miner's certificate, and no other.

Page XL of Laws of Canada, 1898:

FREE MINERS AND THEIR PRIVILEGES.

1. Every person over but not under 18 years of age shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of a free miner, * * * and shall be considered a free miner upon taking out a miner's certificate. * * *

2. A free miner's certificate may be granted for one year * * * upon the payment therefor of the sum of $10.

That was to citizens and to aliens alike. There was no distinction made.

At page L of the above volume, regulations concerning quartz mining claims, part 1, "every person over the age of 18 shall be considered a free miner. A free miner's certificate runs for one year."

Royalty to be paid: At page XLIV, section 30, of above volume, a royalty of 10 per cent of the gross product from any placer mine is exacted, but this royalty is not to be applied where the amount of gold taken out of any single claim is less than $5,000 in any single year.

NOTE.—Formerly the amount of exemption was $2,500, but this was changed by order in council of March 30, 1899. (See Statutes of Canada, English edition, 1899, page LXVII.)

There is no royalty exacted from quartz miners, and there is no alien law as applied to such claims.

The great majority, I suppose 75 per cent, of the money we have taken out of their quartz claims. Now, this is the British Columbia mining law that was passed against aliens about which correspondence was had, which I will soon refer to.

BRITISH COLUMBIA MINING LAWS.

In January, 1899, a law was passed by British Columbia confining the issuing of miners' licenses for placer mining to British subjects. This act applied only to claims located after February 3, 1899, the date when the news of the change from free mining reached Atlin, British Columbia. Previous to this free mining for both quartz and placer was allowed. There is a 1 per cent royalty on gross output in certain classes of mines in British Columbia in lieu of the ordinary property tax. Quartz mining is free to all persons in British Columbia. (Engineering and Mining Journal, volume 67, at pages 107, 126, 146.)

Atlin is not in the Yukon country; this is British Columbia. In the Yukon country there is a large area of free mining, and is still. Free mining has not been interfered with; but Atlin was a mining district in British Columbia south of the Yukon country. There some mines were found and there was complaint. All this complaint grew up about the treatment of our miners there, and about which the correspondence with the State Department took place. But I see by the papers that, in pursuance of the suggestion in this correspondence, they have contrived a plan to have free mining in Atlin and to be much more liberal.

"Atlin open to Americans" is a heading in this morning's Post.

ATLIN OPEN TO AMERICANS—CHANGE OF CANADA'S POLICY TOWARD ALIEN MINERS IN THE KLONDIKE.

MONTREAL, April 17, 1900.

Hon. Smith Curtis, minister of mines in the British Columbia cabinet, announces that the alien-labor law, which was passed by the British Columbia legislature at its last session to exclude American miners from the Atlin district, will be repealed at the July session of the legislature. To allow Americans to work placer mines in the meantime, the government has decided to grant free miners' certificates to companies incorporated under the laws of the province of British Columbia.

As the expense of incorporation is small, the Americans holding claims, or desiring to do so, can follow out their inclinations with little more trouble than British subjects. After the law is repealed all will be on the same footing.

They have taken measures to rectify that wrong on the representation of our State Department, and inasmuch as the legislature does not meet until July, they have authorized American miners to form corporations and to work their mines, showing a liberal spirit on their part. The correspondence with the State Department shows a proper spirit on the part of the Canadian authorities, in that they compare our laws with theirs and want to meet us more than halfway.

This is extremely important, because if we have prohibitory laws and if the Canadian government and Russia do the same, it is going to make mining in the Arctic almost impossible. If any person finds a mine in the Arctic he is a world-wide benefactor. It is only the most hardy who can do it.

These Laplanders who are so abused here in the Senate Chamber have conferred greater benefits upon this country than that number of American citizens, I do not care where you find them. They have opened and led the way to a great accumulation of gold to assist in our prosperity. They are hardy and industrious men, and every one of them has declared his intention to become a citizen. A few of them made a mistake. They were told by the officers that they could make their declaration of intention before a United States commissioner.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is it well settled who did discover gold at Cape Nome?

Mr. STEWART. The Laplanders discovered it, of course. They made the location.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But had gold been discovered before they came?

Mr. STEWART. That is a disputed point. The Laplanders went in first and made the first location, and the presumption is that they discovered it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I only asked the question to obtain the information as a matter of curiosity.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator from Nevada will permit me a moment, I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to a communication which appears in the RECORD which seems to have been addressed to the President of the United States on the 25th of May, 1899, signed by some thirty or forty or probably fifty residents of the Cape Nome country. In the fourth subdivision of the communication the following statement is made:

Fourth. That the aforesaid H. L. Blake and one N. O. Holtberg made the first discovery of gold during the summer of 1898, in what is now known as Cape Nome mining district.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Who were Blake and Holtberg?

Mr. CARTER. They were citizens of the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Soldiers?

Mr. CARTER. No, sir; they were prospectors.

And afterwards imparted the information of such discoveries to their supposed friends, H. P. Anderson and H. E. Carlson, the Swedish missionaries, respectively at Golovin Bay and Unalaklet, and it was agreed between them that they would return to said district together at a later date and organize a mining district. The aforesaid missionaries, disregarding their promise, secretly and clandestinely and unknown to the said Blake, organized a party consisting of E. Lindbloom, E. Linderberg (who is employed by the United States Government in the care of the reindeer station at Eaton), W. C. Price, and E. N. Kittelsen, and 12 Laplanders (whose names are unknown) in the United States Government employ, and sent them to Cape Nome to locate mining claims in the aforesaid Cape Nome mining district and organize the same, and they did so locate many claims and organize said district.

Mr. STEWART. I do not believe a word of that, because those people do not show any knowledge of the subject. They narrate wild stories which bear the marks of falsehood. The place from which this Munchausen story originated is about 200 miles from Cape Nome. No one of the signers states that he was at Cape Nome or that he knows any fact connected with the mines of Cape Nome of his own knowledge.

If those men had found mines, they would have located them. It is the first instinct of a miner if he finds a mine to make a location. They made no mark there. I do not believe they were there. I believe these Laplanders were the first, because they were the first who made a location.

Mr. CARTER. That may be. I merely read the statement which was addressed to the President.

Mr. STEWART. He signed it for the league, did he not?

Mr. CARTER. No, sir; there are a number of persons who seem to have subscribed to the paper.

Mr. STEWART. That is a law and order league of certain citizens.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Nevada suspend a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in and to the government of the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the unfinished business will be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to one fact?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Right in this paper that the Senator from Montana has called attention to there is an affidavit from Dr. Kittelsen, who describes who the first discoverers of gold at Cape Nome were. Dr. Kittelsen is known both to myself and the Senator from Wisconsin. He was born in the county where the Senator lives. There is his affidavit, and he is as reliable a man as could be found. This statement that the Senator from Montana has read is untrue and is disproved by the statement of Dr. Kittelsen under oath.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What document does the Senator refer to?

Mr. NELSON. I am referring to Senate Document No. 272.

Mr. STEWART. I was just about to read that document in connection with my statement.

Mr. CARTER. What is the document?

Mr. NELSON. It is Senate Document No. 272 of this Congress.

Mr. STEWART. Now, I will read as a part of my remarks Dr. Kittelsen's statement, which bears every impress of verity, and the fact that the law and order leaguers, 150 miles away, did not locate shows that they did not know anything about it. The idea that they would not have located rich mines if they had found them anywhere is absurd. It is too wild a story to be believed. I now read from the affidavit of the recorder of the district, Dr. Kittelsen:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, City of Washington, ss:

Albert N. Kittelsen, M. D., being first duly sworn, on oath says that he is a citizen of the United States, and has been a resident of the Territory of Alaska since 1896; that he arrived at Cape Nome, Alaska, about October, 1898; that prior to that time there were three men located at Cape Nome; two of them were Swedes by birth, but had been in the United States some ten to fifteen years; the third was a Norwegian. Two other persons went there with me; one of them a Laplander and one an American citizen.

The Laplander had declared his intention to become an American citizen in the early spring of that year, and his declaration was filed before L. B. Shepherd, who was a United States commissioner at St. Michaels. The six persons who were then at Cape Nome located claims; some of them had located previous to our arrival. We then formed a mining district and adopted rules and regulations under the laws of the United States. I was elected recorder.

They were all citizens, or had declared their intention to become citizens, except one Laplander, and he had declared it before a commissioner.

Mr. BATE. He believed he had a right to do it?

Mr. STEWART. Believing that he had a right to do it. I continue with Dr. Kittelsen's affidavit:

A few weeks after that miners from the surrounding country commenced coming in, and during the following winter the number rose to between 200 and 300. I recorded all their claims, and in every sense was recognized and acted as mining recorder. The first Laplander located three good claims—one for himself, one for his brother, and one for an associate, who arrived soon after and took possession and worked the claims. These Laplanders worked their claims during the working season of 1899, and sold out to Mr. Lane in the fall of 1899.

One Norwegian located claims on about six different streams and has been in possession of them ever since. The claims of these Laplanders, while they were in possession and working them, were located by other persons called "jumpers."

Later on the claims of the Norwegian were relocated by "jumpers" and recorded by me, because it was my duty to record all claims presented for recordation. I was so instructed by the judge of the district court.

In the summer of 1899 three lawyers located themselves at Cape Nome, whose names were Hubbard, Beeman, and Hume. These relocators, although they did not take possession or work upon the claims they relocated or "jumped," employed Hubbard, Beeman & Hume as their attorneys. Mr. Hubbard, of the firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, an attorney for the relocators, is in the city of Washington. I met him on the 5th of this month in the committee room of Senator HANSBROUGH.

I have no interest whatever in any of the "jumped" or relocated claims, either as original locator or relocator, and no private interest that would be affected by any of the proposed legislation.

ALBERT N. KITTELSEN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 6th day of April, 1900, at Washington, D. C.

[SEAL.] ELKANAH N. WATERS,
Notary Public.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I suggest the want of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. STEWART. I do not want to have these men's property taken without a hearing.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon,	Frye,	McLaurin,	Shoup,
Bard,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Simon,
Bate,	Hale,	Nelson,	Spooner,
Carter,	Hansbrough,	Perkins,	Stewart,
Chandler,	Hawley,	Pettigrew,	Taliaferro,
Clark, Wyo.	Heitfeld,	Pettus,	Teller,
Clay,	Jones, Ark.	Platt, Conn.	Turley,
Cockrell,	Kean,	Quarles,	Vest,
Culberson,	Kenney,	Rawlins,	Wellington.
Fairbanks,	Lindsay,	Ross,
Foraker,	Lodge,	Scott,
Foster,	McComas,	Sewell,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators having responded to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Nevada will proceed.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, when the Senator from Montana interrupted me to interpolate hearsay evidence and to incorporate in the RECORD a wild rumor which has no foundation in fact, I was speaking of the importance of friendly relations with Canada and of having this vast region open for the benefit of mankind, and I was speaking of the miners as benefactors.

Not one in a hundred makes a fortune; not one in a thousand; but the mining instinct leads them on to go to the Arctic Ocean and endure all sorts of hardships, and the world is receiving the benefit of it. A thousand million dollars in four years is not the only benefit that the country has had, but it is the only foundation of our prosperity.

We would have had prosperity all the time if we had not been deprived of silver, and now they want to deprive us of gold by preventing innocent men from mining in the Arctic and denouncing them as Lapps and Japs; denouncing these Laplanders as aliens who have all declared their intention to become citizens, these hardy men who are so beneficial to the country and who will continue to be so beneficial, because if the Arctic is to be explored it must be done by Finns, Swedes, Norwegians, and Laplanders—they will go there and do it.

No other countrymen can do it as well. Why should we abuse them in this way in the Senate of the United States when upon them depends so much of the prosperity of the world in opening up this region in which the gold of the future is lodged? The arctic region depends for its development on Russia, the United States, and Great Britain, and here we have a conciliatory spirit on the part of the Canadians.

They are willing to come half way and more. I read from this morning's Post what they have done in announcing that they agree that free mining should be opened on the 1st of July, in the meantime allowing Americans to work under corporations easily formed, which is practically free mining. I see by some papers that come from Juneau that free mining is already realized there. A Juneau paper says:

W. M. Brook is in the city en route to Atlin, where he has a grant from the British Columbia government to work the Stevendyke by hydraulics. Mr. Brook was formerly mining at Letuya Bay.

Now, this comes from another paper in Juneau. They have a daily paper there, by the way.

W. M. Brook, formerly of the Lituya Bay Gold Mining Company, has secured a grant from the British Columbia government for working the Stevendyke in the Atlin district. This is a great hydraulic proposition, and Mr. Brook expects great things from it.

Mr. Brook is an American citizen.

In connection with the opening of the Atlin mines to American citizens, I should like to have the Secretary read what the privy council say in answer to letters from the Department of State. The State Department very properly, and more patriotically than some Senators, has been trying to have this region opened. I have been talking it everywhere, in season and out of season, that we must harmonize these matters, so that our miners can go into British Columbia and their miners can come here; so that the hardy miners everywhere may mine in the arctic region; which is now the only hope of mankind so far as we know. Let us develop the mineral resources of that region.

Do not abuse the hardy men who go into that region; do not misrepresent them and say they are aliens and that they are robbing American citizens when they are there furnishing labor for American citizens, and thousands of American citizens are flocking there, steamers are going up there constantly; and notwithstanding all that, those hardy pioneers are abused on the floor of the Senate, and it is proposed to confiscate their property and pass harsh laws against them. I will fight and protest against such laws, for I have seen all these things. Such legislation can not be secured without a protest. There will be a protest, and there will be a long and a serious one.

I ask the Secretary to read the extract from a report of the committee of the honorable the privy council, approved by his excellency on the 16th of August, 1899, sent through the Secretary of State as part of the correspondence he has had on this subject.

The Secretary read as follows:

Extract from a report of the committee of the honorable the privy council, approved by his excellency on the 16th August, 1899.

The committee of the privy council have had under consideration a dispatch, hereto attached, dated 7th April, 1899, from Her Majesty's ambassador to the United States, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of State for the United States, inclosing a petition to the President of the United States from a number of citizens resident in the Atlin districts of British Columbia engaged in mining, representing that, having taken out free miners' certificates under the laws of British Columbia, they proceeded to locate placer claims in the Atlin district; but before they were able to record their claims an act was passed by the legislature of British Columbia entitled "An act to amend the placer-mining act," the effect of which it is alleged was to deprive the petitioners of the proprietary rights to any placer mines which, though staked, had not been recorded prior to the passing of the act.

The Secretary of State, to whom the matter was referred, observes that the dispatch from the British ambassador, with the inclosure from the Secretary of State at Washington, including a copy of the petition, was sent to the lieutenant-governor of British Columbia, requesting him to obtain from his ministers an expression of their views on the complaints of the petitioners. An answer has now been received, which in effect declares that the statements in the petition are very much exaggerated; that under the mining laws of the Province no right can be acquired until the claim has been recorded, and that all recorded claims are exempted from the operation of the act referred to.

The government of British Columbia, recognizing, however, that possibly through lack of sufficient facilities for recording claims there may have been some instances where locatees were unable within a reasonable time to record their claims, introduced an amending act in the same session, which was adopted, authorizing the appointment of a judge of the supreme court as a commissioner with full power to settle all disputes in that district in accordance with equity and the spirit of the mining acts, without being bound by the strict letter of the law.

As the report of the judge has not yet been made public, it is impossible to say how wide a discretion he has exercised in considering claims of American miners actually located but not recorded prior to the 18th January, 1899, the date of the passing of the act amending the placer-mining act. If, however, any reliance can be placed on newspaper reports, it would appear from the extracts hereto attached, taken from the Victoria Daily Times of the 13th and 17th July, 1899, that the judge was disposed to be influenced in his decision by the equities of the case rather than by the strict letter of the statute.

The public lands in British Columbia belong to the province, and the policy of granting or of withholding licenses to aliens is under the exclusive control of its legislature, and it would be contrary to the spirit of the constitution to interfere with a provincial act dealing with the disposition of its public lands.

For the past thirty years the mining laws of British Columbia have been of the most liberal character, and citizens of the United States have derived larger profits from the mines of that province than any other nationality.

It is no exaggeration to say that over 75 per cent of the mineral wealth of the Kootenay district in southern British Columbia has gone to enrich American citizens, and the first restrictive legislation introduced is the act referred to relating to placer mines, and which seems to have been suggested by section 2319 of the mineral-lands act of the United States.

The contrast heretofore between the mining laws existing on the north side of the forty-ninth parallel and the laws on the same subject that prevail on the south side of that parallel of latitude, has been so marked as to frequently evoke strong comments. Section 2319 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to mineral lands reads as follows:

"All valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and purchase, and the lands in which they are found to occupation and purchase, by citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such, under regulations prescribed by law, and according to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same are applicable and not inconsistent with the laws of the United States."

The clause on the same subject in the British Columbia act referred to grants the rights and privileges of a British subject in taking up placer-mining claims; also "to those who have declared their intention to become such." The similarity in the language of the two sections is noticeable.

The public lands in the Northwest and Yukon territories belong to the Federal authority, and American citizens have availed themselves of the liberal laws of the Dominion to acquire mineral lands and mining rights in the Yukon in a greater proportion than any other nationality, and the reports of the gold dust now arriving at Seattle and other American ports confirm the impression that the citizens of the United States are receiving a larger share of the wealth of the Yukon than even Canadians.

It is no doubt true that by section 13 of chapter 209, approved on the 14th of May, 1898, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 13. That native-born citizens of the Dominion of Canada shall be accorded in said district of Alaska the same mining rights and privileges accorded to citizens of the United States in British Columbia and the Northwest Territory by the laws of the Dominion of Canada or the local laws, rules, and regulations, but no greater rights shall be thus accorded than citizens of the United States or persons who have declared their intention to become such may enjoy in said district of Alaska; and the Secretary of the Interior shall from time to time promulgate and enforce rules and regulations to carry this provision into effect"—

Congress evinced a desire to extend to native-born Canadians mining rights in Alaska similar to those enjoyed by American citizens in the Yukon territory; but as the system in Canada is to grant mining licenses and the practice in the United States is to grant the land in fee, and as the dimensions of the mining claims in the one country are not equal to the area in the other country, the officials in Alaska have taken advantage of the technical difference between the mining laws in Alaska and the British Yukon to nullify section 13 referred to, the contention of American officials being that the Canadian law relating to the acquisition of mining rights must first conform to the American statutes before native-born Canadians can take up mining claims in Alaska.

The discrimination against British subjects on one side of the international boundary compared with the absence of any discrimination against American citizens on the other side of the line has no doubt had its effect on public opinion in British Columbia, and has resulted in the passing of the act to which objection is now taken.

The minister further observes that a like sentiment is growing in other parts of the Dominion, and it will be a cause for great regret if that feeling becomes so general as to force the parliament of Canada to adopt mining laws similar in their discriminating character to those that have been passed by the Congress at Washington.

The committee advise that Your Excellency be moved to transmit a certified copy of this minute and of the report of the government of British Columbia to Her Majesty's embassy at Washington for communication to the honorable the Secretary of State at Washington.

All which is respectfully submitted to Your Excellency's approval.

JOHN J. McGEE, Clerk of the Privy Council.

AT GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
Victoria, B. C., June 8, 1899.

SIR: Adverting to your letter of the 5th ultimo, wherewith you forwarded a petition to the President of the United States from certain residents of Atlin, complaining of recent mining legislation of this Province, I have the honor to transmit herewith a certified copy of an approved minute of my executive council, dated yesterday, embodying the views of my government in respect to the alleged grievances of the petitioners, and as to the scope of the said legislation.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

THOS. R. McINNIS,
Lieutenant-Governor.

The SECRETARY OF STATE,
Ottawa, Canada.

PROVINCE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Copy of a report of a committee of the honorable the executive council, approved by his honor the lieutenant-governor on the 7th day of June, 1899.

The committee of council concur in the report inclosed herewith, and advise that a copy of the same, if approved, be forwarded to the honorable the secretary of state, for the information of his excellency the Governor-General in council.

A. CAMPBELL REDDIE,
Deputy Clerk, Executive Council.

To His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor in Council:

The undersigned has had before him for consideration a communication from the lieutenant-governor, dated the 12th ultimo, wherewith is transmitted a copy of a petition addressed to the President of the United States by certain residents of Atlin, complaining of recent mining legislation of this province, as therein set forth.

The undersigned has the honor to report as follows in regard to said petition:

The petition states that four-fifths of the claims prospected and located belong to citizens of the United States; thus, according to the petition itself, there is only one-fifth left for other aliens and our own citizens. This statement is probably, like the other statements in the petition, greatly exaggerated; but there is sufficient truth in it to justify (if this proportion between aliens and citizens should be maintained) the stand which the legislature took to carry out their avowed policy—the reservation of the provincial placer mines for British subjects.

The question whether such policy was in the true interest of the Province is one for the legislature and the legislature alone, and the unanimity with which that body indorsed this policy is sufficient to show that the Government and the legislature were in complete accord in the matter. There is no attempt to discriminate between the native-born and the naturalized citizen, nor to throw any difficulty whatever in the way of an alien desiring to become naturalized; all that is done is to say our placer mines are reserved for those who are prepared to acknowledge their obligations as citizens of the British Empire.

Taking up the complaints in the petition seriatim, we would say any rights acquired by the petitioners have been preserved to them. The legislation complained of specifically exempts all claims recorded prior to its passage, and provides for the unimpeded working of such claims by the holders, although aliens. A reference to the mining laws will show that their whole tenor is, as it necessarily must be, that no right is acquired until a claim is recorded. As already stated, all such rights are scrupulously respected. It may be well to note this, as a casual reader of the petition unacquainted with the facts might naturally suppose that such claims had been confiscated.

The Government, with the sanction of the legislature, had an unquestioned right to reserve any lands they might think fit from the prospector and miner. They might have said the Crown retains in its possession for the present all mines and minerals the property of the Crown in the northern part of the Province, and no one will be allowed to prospect for or appropriate minerals in that section. Such a course might have been taken with a view of working these claims for the Crown for its own direct benefit or with the purpose of having these claims in reserve after the mining interests in the other parts of the Province had been more fully developed.

Suppose such a course had been adopted; that all the miners had been excluded from the lands in question. The absurdity of the petitioners' claims would be seen at once, and the absurdity exists no less, although the reserve thus made has been relaxed so far as citizens are concerned. The grievance of the petitioners is really not that they are shut out, but that others are admitted.

The fifth clause of the petition claims that the petitioners had acquired vested rights by taking out free miners' certificates, not only to the rights granted by such certificates at the time, but to renewal in perpetuity of such rights. To state this is to refute it; the Crown and the legislature in providing for the granting to free miners the right to prospect for and appropriate minerals did not and could not divest themselves of the power to amend the terms and conditions of such certificates in any manner that might be deemed expedient. When recorded claims were exempted from the operation of the law, everything, as already stated, had been done that the most extreme advocate of vested rights could justly claim.

The sixth clause of the petition complains of alleged losses to the petitioners through lack of sufficient facilities for recording claims. This to some extent may have been the case, but, so far as it did exist, was caused by unavoidable circumstances for which no responsibility attaches to the Government.

So anxious have the Government and legislature been to minimize as much as possible any hardship or injustice which may have been occasioned by the sudden rush into the northern country, following on the discovery of rich diggings there, that an act was passed at the last session of the legislature providing for the appointment of a judge of the supreme court as a commissioner with full powers to settle all disputes in that country in accordance with equity and the spirit of the mining acts without being bound by the strict letter of the law.

The grievance complained of in the seventh clause of the petition, that aliens can not obtain work on claims held by citizens, has already been removed. By the legislation of last session the necessity of a laborer in a mine taking out a free miners' certificate is done away with.

The eighth clause of the petition alleges great injury to the interests of the country through the action of the law complained of. This, however, is purely a matter for the legislature to judge of and is of no concern to outsiders. The Government do not consider the statement is true nor that any present depreciation, even if such exists, is likely to be lasting.

The ninth clause of the petition alleges damages to citizens of the United States to the extent of many millions. This is only necessary to allude to as a good instance of the absurd misstatements and exaggerations of the whole of the document. As already repeatedly stated, the petitioners had acquired no rights which are in any way affected by the legislation complained of.

Dated this 6th day of June, A. D. 1899.

C. A. SEMLIN, Provincial Secretary.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, we see how utterly false are the assertions that the Canadians have been more illiberal than we have been. On the boundary question I have some prejudice against the action of the Canadians; but I must say, so far as their mining laws are concerned, they are fully as liberal as ours, but neither are as liberal as they ought to be, because every inducement should be held out to any person to go into the arctic regions and discover mines, for that gives employment to American citizens.

Look at the thousands who are now employed in the enterprise of supplying the ships that are running and the vast amount of business that has been created by the discovery of such hardy pioneers as these Norwegians and Laplanders, who discovered these mines at Cape Nome. Their discovery and location can not be blotted out by any mere rumor about some other person finding gold. I never knew a mining region to be discovered but that there would be some wild rumor that there was somebody there before those who claimed to have made the discovery. Everybody laughed at such assertions; because if they had made discoveries, they would have located mines at once.

These men were pioneers; they were orderly men; all but one American citizens, and that one thought he was, according to the statute. They went there in good faith and located in good faith under the rules and regulations of the miners and under the laws of the United States. They formed a mining district. Dr. Kittelsen was elected recorder, and he performed his duties so satisfactorily that nobody else has been elected recorder up to the present time.

As to the number of Laplanders and others, Dr. Jackson, in his affidavit, says:

The larger number of the party expected, after the close of their service with the Government, to try to secure herds of reindeer and establish the industry in Alaska to which they had been brought up from childhood and were accustomed in Lapland. This affidavit has only reference to the party from Lapland in the spring of 1898.

Forty-three Lapps, 15 Norwegians, and 10 Finns, making 68 men, were brought from Lapland in the spring of 1898, under contract with the War Department for one year from February 1, 1898.

They were selected in Lapland with the understanding that they were to become American citizens and to colonize in Alaska, where a Scandinavian element was desirable for the purpose of fostering the reindeer industry. When they reached Port Townsend—the first place where they made a stop of any time in the United States—23 of them were naturalized, and after reaching St. Michael, Alaska, 4 others, who had not had an opportunity of being naturalized at Port Townsend, took out their first papers. Of the 27 that took out their first papers not over 3 or 4, when their contract terminated with the Government, took up mining for their support. Of the 27 mentioned, 11 were Norwegians, 6 were Finns, and 10 were Lapps.

Of the 68 men in the employ of the War Department only one asked to resign before the expiration of his term of service; the other 67 remained until their contract term of service expired, on January 31, 1899, when 40 of those who were discharged from the service went to the mines at Cape Nome.

Of the party that took up claims at the mines I am informed and believe 26 were Norwegians and Finns and but 14 were Lapps.

I would not care if they were all Lapps or all Finns. They have done a great work for this country and they have done great good, which is deserving of commendation and encouragement. The fact that they went there and that these great mining enterprises are going on there is seized upon as a reason why such legislation as is proposed should be passed. But here is the milk in the cocoanut. It is right here in the affidavit of a lawyer, and I wish the Senators would examine it.

A quorum of the Senate ought to be here long enough to hear this affidavit introduced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]. I do not know whether I ought to call for a quorum, but this matter is so important that I think the Senate ought to know what the trouble is.

Mr. BATE. I suggest the want of a quorum, Mr. President.

Mr. STEWART. Yes; let the Senators come in. They can stay a few minutes while I show the colored gentleman in the wood pile. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon,	Deboe,	McBride,	Ross,
Bard,	Fairbanks,	McComas,	Scott,
Bate,	Foraker,	McCumber,	Simon,
Berry,	Foster,	McLaurin,	Spooner,
Carter,	Frye,	McMillan,	Stewart,
Chandler,	Hansbrough,	Martin,	Sullivan,
Clark, Wyo.	Harris,	Nelson,	Teller,
Clay,	Hoar,	Perkins,	Turley,
Culberson,	Kean,	Pettus,	Vest,
Cullom,	Kenney,	Platt, Conn.	Warren,
Davis,	Lodge,	Rawlins,	Wellington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Nevada will proceed.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I apologize on behalf of the Senator from Tennessee for disturbing Senators in their repose to listen to this matter; but I came to a point where I thought the whole gist of this contention rested, and I thought it was necessary to have them know something about it, and here is a point to which I wish attention for a minute or two before they again retire to their rest.

I would state that these claims were located by men who had declared their intention to become citizens, and that they were pioneers there. It was ascertained that one of them had declared his intention before a commissioner who was not authorized to receive declarations, and he happened to strike a very rich claim and sold it at a very high price. When I read the very sincere affidavit of Attorney Oliver P. Hubbard, and then these amendments in connection with it, the force of this proceeding will be appreciated:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, City of Washington, ss:

Oliver P. Hubbard, being duly sworn, on oath says that he is a citizen of the United States, an attorney at law, engaged in the practice of his profession at Nome City, in the Cape Nome mining district, district of Alaska, United States of America; that he first went to Alaska in the spring of 1898; that he is a member of the law firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, of Nome City, Alaska; that the members of the firm are Edwin R. Beeman, formerly a practicing attorney of Minneapolis, Minn., and William I. Hume, formerly a practicing attorney at Portland, Oreg., and this affiant, formerly a practicing attorney at Chicago, Ill.

Affiant says—

Here is the important point:

That the firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume are attorneys in a number of mining suits now pending in the United States district court for the district of Alaska; that among others are suits brought to recover the possession of certain mining claims alleged to have been staked by alien Laplanders; that these claims were located by American citizens in the months of November and December, 1898; that all of the alleged Laplander and alien locations were located by American miners in the fall of 1898 and the winter of 1898 and 1899; that among the miners who made such locations were—

Giving the names. A private party can not take advantage of the alienage of the original locator. Only the Government can interfere. I think that is the statute. But at all events that question exists, and to have that question removed and to clear up a lawsuit and give the property to these jumpers these amendments appear to be fitted.

In some way or another there is a fitness of things that is marked. It may be accidental. It is an accident the like of which probably never happened before on earth that things fitted so well to the case of this man Hubbard, who is trying to get claims worth hundreds of thousands of dollars for his blackmailing clients, which claims are now in the possession of honest men. I will read the Hansbrough amendment, about which there is controvery:

That persons who are not citizens of the United States, or who, prior to making location, had not legally declared their intention to become such, shall not be permitted to locate, hold, or convey mining claims in said district of Alaska, nor shall any title to a mining claim acquired by location or purchase through any such person or persons be legal. In any civil action, suit, or proceeding to recover the possession of a mining claim, or for the appointment of a receiver, or for an injunction to restrain the working and operation of a mining claim, it shall be the duty of the court to inquire into and determine the question of the citizenship of the locator: Provided, That no location of a mining claim shall hereafter be made in the district of Alaska by any person or persons through an agent or attorney in fact, and all locations heretofore made by any person or persons through an agent or attorney in fact upon which $100 worth of labor or improvements had not been expended or made within ninety days first succeeding the date of such location are hereby declared to be null and void.

There is no question about that. The court would have to carry the amendment into effect if it became a law. The proposed substitute of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] accomplishes the same thing. I will read the proposed compromise of the Senator from Montana:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize aliens who have not declared their intention to become citizens of the United States to locate mining claims or to acquire title from the United States to any of the public lands of the United States in the district of Alaska or to in any manner affect or change the laws regulating the disposal of the public lands of the United States in said district. In any civil action, suit, or proceedings hereafter arising in the courts of said district all questions touching upon the competency of the parties to enter or locate public lands shall be considered and determined by the court.

If they are not going to disturb the law, what is the object of this? Where is the motive for it? The law has stood for thirty-five years and been understood and administered by the courts. There is no trouble about it. If it is not to change a rule of law in order to give a man title which he has not got, what is the reason for it? The jumpers for whom Hubbard is attorney have never had possession. They simply had their claims recorded. Their attorney is here. If he did not have anything to do with the drawing of the amendment, how they could have got the information I do not know.

Now, I undertake to say that the title of Mr. Lane and others and the title of the Laplanders is good on the decisions of the courts under the laws of the land, and that this legislation is to take the property of one man and give it to another.

Mr. TELLER. It is good under the statute.

Mr. STEWART. It is good under the statute; good under the decisions; and these were the pioneers who found the mines. To take the mines from these pioneers and give them to the blackmailing jumpers it seems to me is the cruelest piece of legislation I ever heard of.

Besides, by unanimous consent, the Senate has allowed the Committee on Mines and Mining to manage this matter, and that committee has managed it for thirty-five years without complaint on the part of anybody and to the universal satisfaction of the country. Mining has grown up, and the whole country is attached to our mining laws. Now, to remodel those mining laws in the Senate without their having been considered by any committee is a proceeding I never heard of before. This goes beyond anything I have ever heard of in legislating in that respect.

Ah, you say, but it does not do any harm. What is the object, then, if it does not do any harm; if it does not make out a case for Mr. Hubbard? If it does not help him, for whom is it? There is no necessity for remedial legislation. I hope more Norwegians and Laplanders will go there and explore that cold region where others can not live. Let them take their reindeer and go in. I hope they will, and then we will have more business and more prosperity.

I think this is one of the most important questions, whether we shall pass harsh laws, whether we shall have criminations and recriminations which will practically exclude our miners from British Columbia. Seventy-five per cent, they say, and I think more, of the gold and silver and lead that has come from British Columbia has gone to enrich Americans; and the amount has been immense. I wish the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] were here. I understand he has made a fortune in British Columbia. Does he want to have a law passed confiscating his title?

This proposed law will do more. I am told, and cases are mentioned, that as to many of the claims that are being worked—for instance, the Treadwell claim—they could not tell whether the locators were citizens or not. Vast expenditures have been made. If we are to have a lawsuit inquiring into the citizenship of the locators of every mine in Alaska, nobody knows how large a scheme it is to confiscate property that was acquired under the laws of Congress and the decisions of the courts.

Now, the mining laws of the United States were extended to Alaska a long time ago, and they have been in full operation. The Senator from Montana said there was a string to it, or something of that kind. That string has been broken by practice. Very many of the mines are already patented. I read now from Supplement to the Revised Statutes, Volume I, second edition, 1874 to 1891, page 433:

And the laws of the United States relating to mining claims, and the rights incident thereto, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be in full force and effect in said district, under the administration thereof herein provided for, subject to such regulations as may be made by the Secretary of the Interior, approved by the President.

And then it goes further and secures the title to those who are there.

That parties who have located mines or mineral privileges therein under the laws of the United States applicable to the public domain, or who have occupied—

Whether they have located or not—and improved or exercised acts of ownership over such claims, shall not be disturbed therein, but shall be allowed to perfect their title to such claims by payment as aforesaid.

That was in 1884. We want no other legislation whatever. The mining laws of the United States are there. Now, in 1897 there was a special alien-land law passed; a more liberal policy was adopted. There was a prejudice against the holding of large areas in the cattle country by persons who came from Europe, and an alien-land act was passed which also applied to mines. Nobody intended it should apply to mines, and the miners have been trying to get rid of it ever since. Public sentiment was against it. It finally found its way into the legislation of Congress in 1897. It is an act that ought to be studied in this connection, because it has a good deal of bearing.

That an act entitled "An act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens, and so forth," approved March 3, 1887, except so far as it affects real estate in the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That no alien or person who is not a citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in the manner provided by law shall acquire title to or own any land in any of the Territories of the United States except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That the prohibition of this section shall not apply to cases in which the right to hold or dispose of lands in the United States is secured by existing treaties to citizens or subjects of foreign countries, which rights, so far as they may exist by force of any such treaty, shall continue to exist so long as such treaties are in force, and no longer.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not apply to land now owned in any of the Territories of the United States by aliens, which was acquired on or before March 3, 1887, so long as it is held by the then owners, their heirs or legal representatives, nor to any alien who shall become a bona fide resident of the United States, and any alien who shall become—

It shall not apply to any alien who shall become—a bona fide resident of the United States, or shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in the manner provided by law, shall have the right to acquire and hold lands in either of the Territories of the United States upon the same terms as citizens of the United States—

Bona fide residents and then those who have declared their intention to become citizens. These Lapps are about as good bona fide residents as you have ever had up there—

Provided, That if any such resident alien shall cease to be a bona fide resident of the United States, then such alien shall have ten years from the time he ceases to be such bona fide resident in which to alienate such lands.

Now, here is a special provision which controls all of the general provisions of the act, including the last and third section. I want to call the attention of lawyers to this particularly:

This act shall not be construed to prevent any persons not citizens of the United States from acquiring or holding lots or parcels of lands in any incorporated or platted city, town, or village, or in any mine or mining claim, in any of the Territories of the United States.

That is a special provision referring to mines, and it stands there in so many words.

Mr. BATE. What is the date of that?

Mr. STEWART. March 2, 1897.

Here is a special provision with regard to mining claims. Section 7, to which the opposition call our attention, refers only to the public lands. There has always been a distinction kept up between the mining laws and the public-land laws. When you speak of land laws, you do not mean mining laws, and vice versa. The mining laws are special; the land laws are general.

The following is section 7, upon which the jumpers rely:

That this act shall not prevent aliens from acquiring lands or any interests therein by inheritance or in the ordinary course of justice in the collection of debts, nor from acquiring liens on real estate or any interest therein, nor from lending money and securing the same upon real estate or any interest therein; nor from enforcing any such lien, nor from acquiring and holding title to such real estate, or any interest therein, upon which a lien may have heretofore or may hereafter be fixed, or upon which a loan of money may have been heretofore or hereafter may be made and secured.

According to the gentlemen on the other side you destroy the last section.

Provided, however, That all lands so acquired shall be sold within ten years after title shall be perfected in him under said sale or the same shall escheat to the United States and be forfeited as hereinafter provided.

Now, here comes the remedy that they could not apply. They could not escheat it:

That any alien who shall hereafter hold lands in any of the Territories of the United States in contravention of the provisions of this act may nevertheless convey his title thereto at any time before the institution of escheat proceedings as hereinafter provided.

If he made his location in violation of this law, he can sell his ground; he can sell it to Mr. Lane or anybody else, and it will be a good title. He has a right to do that, if he got his title in violation of the act. That troubles the gentlemen. They want to get rid of it. They want to get rid of the title he can convey.

Provided, however, That if any such conveyance shall be made by such alien, either to an alien or to a citizen of the United States, in trust and for the purpose and with the intention of evading the provisions of this act, such conveyance shall be null and void, and any such lands so conveyed shall be forfeited and escheat to the United States.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States, when he shall be informed or have reason to believe that land in any of the Territories of the United States are being held contrary to the provisions of this act, to institute or cause to be instituted suit in behalf of the United States in the district court of the Territory in the district where such land or a part thereof may be situated, praying for the escheat of the same on behalf of the United States to the United States: Provided, That before any such suit is instituted the Attorney-General shall give or cause to be given ninety days' notice by registered letter of his intention to sue, or by personal notice directed to or delivered to the owner of said land, or the person who last rendered the same for taxation, or his agent, and to all other persons having an interest in such lands of which he may have actual or constructive notice. In the event personal notice can not be obtained in some one of the modes above provided, then said notice shall be given by publication in some newspaper published in the county where the land is situate, and if no newspaper is published in said county, then the said notice shall be published in some newspaper nearest said county.

"SEC. 6. That if it shall be determined upon the trial of any such escheat proceedings that the lands are held contrary to the provisions of this act, the court trying said cause shall render judgment condemning such lands and shall order the same to be sold as under execution; and the proceeds of such sale, after deducting costs of such suit, shall be paid to the clerk of such court so rendering judgment, and said fund shall remain in the hands of such clerk for one year from the date of such payment, subject to the order of the alien owner of such lands, or his heirs or legal representatives; and if not claimed within the period of one year, such clerk shall pay the same into the treasury of the Territory in which the lands may be situated, for the benefit of the available school fund of said Territory: Provided, That the defendant in any such escheat proceedings may, at any time before final judgment, suggest and show to the court that he has conformed with the law, either becoming a bona fide resident of the United States, or by declaring his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States, or by the doing or happening of any other act which, under the provisions of this act, would entitle him to hold or own real estate, which being admitted or proved, such suit shall be dismissed on payment of costs and a reasonable attorney fee to be fixed by the court.

There is no snap judgment about it. In the first place, the court has held over and over again that nobody but the United States can institute these proceedings, and after the United States institutes these proceedings the party has in the first place the power to sell it to anybody, no matter whether or not he acquired it in contravention of the law, before escheat proceedings, and after proceedings are had he can declare his intention to become a citizen or a bona fide resident and the case is dismissed. But the Carter and Hansbrough amendments compel the court to inquire into the citizenship of the original locator and defeat the claim, which is now held under the sanction of the statutes and the decisions of the courts. The authorities are all against the jumpers.

I will first call attention to a very creditable book which is an authority, a very fair book, Lindley on Mines, where all the cases are collated and the conclusion honestly and fairly drawn. It is very convincing. I will read his conclusions first. This author says:

It has been authoritatively determined by the Supreme Court of the United States that the estate created by a perfect mining location and transferred to an alien is not analogous to an estate created by descent; in other words, that is not an estate created by operation of law.

We think we are justified in asserting that the following principles have been established by the weight of authority:

(1) That a location made by an alien, if otherwise valid, creates in him an estate which can be divested only at the instigation of the government in a proceeding to which it is either directly or indirectly a party.

(2) That such estate, when vested in a citizen, is as complete as if originally acquired by him by location, and no one, not even the government, can assail his title.

Not even the Government can assail his title; but the trouble is that these titles are inchoate until the money is paid. That is the rule which has been followed in land cases; so that Congress has the constitutional power to destroy an inchoate title in these men. The courts have decided that Congress has power to destroy an inchoate title. The Government can repudiate the location made by an alien or a citizen before patent is granted. That is well established. Until the money is paid Congress can destroy the title. It has been in question all the while, but the Supreme Court held that Congress had the power.

After reviewing all the authorities at great length, Mr. Lindley draws his conclusions, as follows:

(1) An alien may locate or purchase a mining claim, and until "inquest of office" may hold and dispose of the same in like manner as a citizen.

(2) Proceedings to obtain patents are in the nature of "inquest of office," and in such proceedings citizenship is a necessary and material fact to be alleged and proved.

An alien can not get a patent, but he can fix himself so as to get a patent. He can declare his intention after he makes his location, and that secures it. The Supreme Court has so repeatedly held. If an alien wants a patent, all he has to do is to declare his intention. An alien can do that just as well as a citizen. There is no trouble about that.

(3) In all other classes of actions between individuals with which the Government has no concern citizenship is not a fact in issue; it need be neither alleged or proved.

In the suit which Mr. Hubbard has brought for these jumpers, the original locators will not have to allege citizenship at all or prove it. There is no necessity for it at all.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator will permit me. The effect of the proposed amendment is simply to change the law as it stands now.

Mr. STEWART. That is what it is. It changes it to fit these cases, and will stand for all time in that respect.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The intention of the amendment, as I recollect reading it, is to relate back to and to cover cases under the present law.

Mr. STEWART. Any case that appears in a court. It requires a court to take notice of it. The amendment of the Senator from North Dakota and the amendment of the Senator from Montana require the same thing.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. While Congress can not pass a law to affect a vested right, it can pass a law to affect a man's right of action in court.

Mr. STEWART. It can do this in regard to all inchoate rights to public lands. It can make changes before the money is paid.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It can change his remedy but not his right.

Mr. STEWART. It can change his remedy, and changing his remedy takes away his right. A court could not, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, listen to that at all. It could not allow them to go back to the locator to see whether he was a citizen or not. That would not be allowed under the existing law.

(4) Naturalization of an alien at any time subsequent to either location or purchase is retroactive and enables him to proceed to patent. The antecedent bar to patent by reason of his alienage is removed.

These are the conclusions to which this author has arrived after reviewing all the decisions. I wish to call attention to some of the decisions.

I call attention now to the case in Montana which was referred to yesterday, Manuel against Wulff (152 U. S., 505):

A deed of a mining claim by a qualified locator to an alien operates as a transfer of the claim to the grantee, subject to question in regard to his citizenship by the Government only.

If, in a contest concerning a mining claim, under Revised Statutes, section 2326, one party, who is an alien at the outset, becomes a citizen during the proceedings and before judgment, his disability, under Revised Statutes, section 2319, to take title is thereby removed.

The case that I now call attention to is Federal Reporter, volume 51, page 338, Billings et al. vs. Aspen Mining and Smelting Company et al., circuit court of appeals, Eighth circuit, July 5, 1892. I read the syllabus:

1. Mining claims—Capacity of aliens to hold.

An alien who has expended time, money, and labor in exploring for and locating a mining claim on public lands, conjointly with others, may hold his interest, or recover the same if deprived thereof, as against his colocators, and as against all the world except the United States, though Revised Statutes, 2319, confines the right of exploration, purchase, and occupation of unsurveyed mining lands to citizens of the United States, or persons who have declared their intention to become citizens.

Notwithstanding that, an alien may hold his claim against all the world except the United States. It is argued out by the court at great length, and the syllabus is thoroughly sustained.

This same case went up on rehearing. It was thoroughly discussed before the circuit court of the United States of the ninth circuit (Federal Reporter, volume 52, page 250). The syllabus is as follows:

1. Mining claims—capacity of alien to hold.

One who asserts title to a mining claim under a location made by an alien and two citizens can not defeat the claims of the alien's heirs on the ground that, under Revised Statutes, 2319, an alien can not be a locator, for mining rights constitute no exception to the general rule that the right to defeat a title on the ground of alienage is reserved to the Government alone. (O'Reilly vs. Campbell, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep., 421; 116 U. S., 418, distinguished; 51 Fed. Rep., 338, affirmed.)

Here is a case in the 56th Pacific Reporter where the cases are cited, and I think I will have the Secretary read it for the general information of the Senate. It is a good case and is well sustained. The cases are cited. I should like to have the Secretary read, commencing at page 300, Wilson et al. vs. Triumph Consolidated Mining Company, supreme court of Utah, March 14, 1899. Read the syllabus and all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Wilson et al. vs. Triumph Consolidated Mining Company. Supreme court of Utah. March 14, 1899.]

Location of mining claims by alien—Transfer to citizen—Vesting of title—Citizenship of domestic corporation—When question of citizenship can not arise—Mining claim held by alien—Relocated—Title to justify possession—Notice of location—How construed—Sufficiency—Work of one claim for benefit of group—Question for jury.

1. Where a mining claim is located by an alien on unappropriated Government land, and all the acts necessary to a valid location are performed by him, and he and his representatives, claiming to be the owners thereof, perform the work necessary to keep the claim good until it is conveyed to a citizen, and no rights of third parties have attached prior to the conveyance, as between private citizens, in which the Government is not interested, the conveyance vests the title in the citizen, although the original locator was an alien.

2. A corporation organized under the laws of Utah is a citizen of the State.

3. Although it is true, as a general rule, that only citizens of the United States can locate mining claims, the question of citizenship can only be raised by the Government; and in an action of ejectment in a contest between individuals the question can not arise.

4. A qualified locator may relocate a mining claim in the possession of an alien who has not declared his intention to become a citizen, if relocation be made without force or violence, and prior to declaration of intention or conveyance to a citizen. As against an intruder, possession is prima facie evidence of right to possession, but, as against one connecting himself with the Government title, mere occupancy must yield to the higher right.

5. A lease and bond from an administrator under order of court and by consent of all parties interested, and an actual possession by consent of all parties, is sufficient showing of title under which to justify possession.

6. The construction given a notice of location should be liberal and not technical, and a notice which refers to a known mining claim, with date of its location or to recorded claims adjoining it, with a joisting shaft, is a sufficient compliance with the law requiring a reference to be made to some natural object or permanent monument.

7. Where the testimony tends to show the consolidation of a group of claims for development and working purposes and that the required amount of work was done on one claim for all and that defendant's grantor was the owner of all the claims by location or assignment, the question of whether work on one would inure to the benefit of all was properly left to the jury.

(Syllabus by the court.)

Appeal from district court, Juab County; E. V. Higgins, judge.

Action by William D. Wilson and others against the Triumph Consolidated Mining Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

This action in ejectment was brought by the plaintiffs and appellants in Juab County against the defendant and respondent to recover possession of a certain mining claim called the "Steeple Chase" by the appellants, and the "Mormon Chief" by the respondent, located in Tintic mining district, State of Utah.

The appellants insist that the Steeple Chase mining claim was located January 1, 1897, by one R. C. Alexander, their grantor, upon unappropriated mineral land of the United States, subject to location in observance of all the laws of the United States and the by-laws of the Tintic mining district, and that the appellants are the owners thereof, subject to the paramount title therein in the United States; and that while the plaintiffs and their grantors were the owners and entitled to the possession of Steeple Chase mining claim, the defendant, on the 15th day of January, 1897, entered into possession of said claim, and unlawfully withholds the possession of said claim from the plaintiffs, to their damage, etc.

It appears that J. F. Kappes, at the time of his death, September 24, 1895, was the owner of the Mormon Chief, which covers the same ground as the Steeple Chase, located August 10, 1882, by W. W. Hinch and O. T. McMillan. The Pride of the Hills mine was located August 11, 1885, by J. F. Kappes; the Sunday mine was located January 21, 1890, by J. F. Kappes and George Kappes; the Sunday Extension was located November 29, 1890, by J. F. Kappes; and the Silver Star was located January 29, 1892, by J. F. Kappes.

These five claims were lying contiguous to each other. Notice of the consolidation of these five claims for working purposes, including the Mormon Chief, was duly made and recorded, and the group consolidated on or before 1896. On November 9, 1895, Hugo Deprizin was appointed administrator of the estate of J. F. Kappes, deceased. The administrator expended $500 in assessment work on these consolidated claims in 1896 by running a tunnel in the Pride of the Hills mine, the work being completed on November 28, 1896.

This work was done for development work, for the benefit of the five claims named. On December 24, 1896, Deprizin, as administrator, and under an order of the probate court, and by consent and agreement of all the heirs and parties interested in the estate of J. F. Kappes, deceased, entered into a contract to sell, bond, and lease said five claims to Valentine Kramer for $10,000, of which sum $1,563.31 was paid in cash, with an option to pay the balance in two years. Kramer went into possession and at work on the five claims in December, 1896, and continued at work until January 7, 1897.

On January 11, 1897, Kramer assigned his contract to Kirby; and on February 12, 1897, Kirby assigned his contract to the respondent, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Utah. From January 5, 1897, to the time of the trial, continuous work was done by the respondent and its grantors on the property. George Kappes had previous to 1896 conveyed his interest in the claims to J. F. Kappes.

The respondent, in its answer, denied all the allegations of the complaint and alleged that the plaintiffs had no right, title, or interest in said claims and are not, and never were, entitled to the possession thereof. The Steeple Chase mining claim, claimed by the appellants as having been located by their grantor January 1, 1897, is the same ground as the Mormon Chief, included in said group, and conveyed by the administrator of J. F. Kappes by lease, bond, and sale. This is the only claim involved in this litigation. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal.

Mr. STEWART. I again call attention to the case of Manuel vs. Wulff (152 U. S., page 505), and I wish to emphasize that case. That is the Montana case that was cited by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. I call attention to the fact that that case was overruled by the Supreme Court. I do not know but that I had better read a considerable portion of it.

The supreme court of Montana recognized the settled rule that an alien may take and hold land by purchase until office found, and that if the alien become a citizen before his alienage has been adjudged the act of naturalization takes effect by relation; but held that "possessory rights to mining claims on the public domain of the United States," although "endowed with the qualities of real estate to a high degree," did not come within that rule.

The argument was that as by statute mineral lands are not open to exploration, occupation, or purchase by aliens, but only by citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such, and upon compliance with the laws and local mining rules and regulations as to location and possession, title and possessory rights to mining claims thus acquirable solely by virtue of the statute and in the manner prescribed thereby, must be regarded as passing as by operation of law and not as by grant.

Hence that mining claims are controlled by the rule which forbids the alien to take or hold real estate by descent, since it is the rule of law and not the act of the party that vests title in the heir, and it would be an idle thing to vest title by one act of law and then take it away by another.

The court was of opinion that upon principle the analogy between an alien heir claiming by descent and an alien miner claiming under the mining laws was complete, and that as Moses Manuel was incapable of taking, the conveyance to him by Alfred Manuel, who was a citizen, amounted to an abandonment by the latter. We are unable to concur in this view. We do not think that the transfer of a mining claim by a qualified locator to an alien is to be treated as ipso facto an abandonment or that the analogy of such a case to the casting of descent upon an alien can be maintained.

Among the cases often referred to upon the general subject and cited by the Montana supreme court is Governeur vs. Robertson (11 Wheat., 332, 350, 354). That was an action of ejectment and the facts these: Plaintiff claimed under one Brantz, who, being an alien, obtained, October 11, 1874, two grants from the Commonwealth of Virginia of lands lying in Kentucky. He became naturalized in Maryland, November 8, 1874, and his title was confirmed to him and to his heirs and their grantees by the legislature of Kentucky in 1796 and 1799. Defendant claimed under a grant of Virginia made to a citizen in 1785.

This court, speaking by Mr. Justice Johnson, among other things, said:

"On this subject of relation the authorities are so ancient, so uniform, and universal that nothing can raise a doubt that it has a material bearing on this cause, but the question whether naturalization in Maryland was equivalent to naturalization in Kentucky. To this the Articles of Confederation furnish an affirmative answer, and the defendant has not made it a question.

"Nor, indeed, has he made a question on the subject of relation back; yet, it is not easy to see how he could claim the benefit of an affirmative answer on the question he has raised, without first extricating his cause from the effects of the subsequent naturalization, upon the rights derived to Brantz through his patent. The question argued, and intended to be exclusively presented here, is whether a patent for land to an alien be not an absolute nullity.

"The argument is that it was so at common law, and that the Virginia land laws, in some of their provisions, affirm the common law on this subject.

"We think the doctrine of the defendant is not to be sustained on either ground.

* * * * * * *

"It is clear, therefore, that this doctrine has no sufficient sanction in authority, and it will be found equally unsupported by principle or analogy.

"The general rule is positively against it, for the books, old and new, uniformly represent the King as a competent grantor in all cases in which an individual may grant, and any person in esse, and not civiliter mortuus, as a competent grantee. Femes covert, infants, aliens, persons attainted of treason or felony, clerks, convicts, and many others are expressly enumerated as competent grantees. (Perkins, Grant, 47, 48, 51, etc.; Comyn's Dig. Grant, B. 1.) It behooves those, therefore, who would except aliens, when the immediate object of the King's grant, to maintain the exception.

"It is argued that there is an analogy between this case and that of the heir, or the widow, or the husband alien;" no one of whom can take, but the King shall enter upon them without office found. Whereas an alien may take by purchase and hold until divested by office found. It is argued that the reason usually assigned for this distinction, to wit, nil frustra agit lex, may, with the same correctness, be applied to the case of a grant by the King to an alien, as to one taking by descent, dower, or courtesy: That the alien only takes from the King to return the subject of the grant back again to the King by escheat.

But this reasoning obviously assumes as law the very principle it is introduced to support, since unless the grant be void it can not be predicated of it that it was executed in vain. It is also inconsistent with a known and familiar principle in law, and one lying at the very root of the distinction between taking by purchase and taking by descent. It implies, in fact, a repugnancy in language.

Since the very reason of the distinction between aliens taking by purchase and by descent is that one takes by deed, the other by act of law; whereas a grantee, ex vi termini, takes by deed, and not by act of law. If there is any view of the subject in which an alien, taking under grant, may be considered as taking by operation of law, it is because the grant issues, and takes effect, under a law of the State. But this is by no means the sense of the rule, since attaching to it this idea would be to declare the legislative power of the State incompetent to vest in an alien even a defeasible estate.

The court argues that it is good under any law that the alien can free himself of disabilities at any time before final judgment, and this is nothing more than what is contained in the statute to which I have referred, the statute of 1897. Here the law as laid down by the Supreme Court is reenacted in this statute as to public lands, and then the particular provision that an alien may locate mines in Alaska, it is said, is abrogated by the general provision in section 7:

SEC. 7. That this act shall not in any manner be construed to refer to the District of Columbia, nor to authorize aliens to acquire title from the United States to any of the public lands of the United States, or to in any manner affect or change the laws regulating the disposal of the public lands of the United States.

That refers to public-land laws, not to mining laws, because it is a special provision in regard to mining.

And the act of which this act is an amendment shall remain in force and unchanged by this act so far as it refers to or affects real estate in the District of Columbia.

But if that exception referred to mining laws, still the provision remains that only the Government can take advantage of it, and that the party may at any time free himself of this disability. The title of the persons who have bought claims from these Laplanders, Norwegians, and Finns is perfect.

There is no question about that. If it were not the case, what other object is there in these amendments? Have they any other conceivable object except to change the rule of law fixed by statute, to change the rule of law established by the Supreme Court? What other object can there be in making this apply except to take one man's property and give it to another?

Here is another case in the Supreme Court of the United States, in volume 171. I read from page 62. Here is where they go on and maintain this possessory right. They always sustain existing rights, although there may be some legislation in contradistinction from it.

Here is a case where they refer to Sparrow vs. Strong. It is the first case that ever came up to the United States Supreme Court in which the objection was made that the court had no jurisdiction because locators had no property, Congress not having acted, and the Supreme Court of the United States held that they could not shut their eyes to what had occurred in California and the surrounding States; that they could not confiscate the property of a million of men, but they would presume that they had title. This case is in 171 United States, page 62. It is the case of Del Monte Mining Company against Last Chance Mining Company.

Notwithstanding that there was no general legislation on the part of Congress, the fact of explorers searching the public domain for mines and their possessory rights to the mines by them discovered was generally recognized, and the rules and customs of miners in any particular district were enforced as valid. As said by this court in Sparrow vs. Strong (3 Wall., 97, 104):

"We know also that the Territorial legislature has recognized by statute the validity and binding force of the rules, regulations, and customs of the mining districts; and we can not shut our eyes to the public history which informs us that under this legislation, and not only without interference by the National Government, but under its implied sanction, vast mining interests have grown up, employing many millions of capital, and contributing largely to the prosperity and improvement of the whole country."

Other cases cited:

See, also, Forbes vs. Gracey, 94 U. S., 762; Jennison vs. Kirk, 98 U. S., 453, 459; Broder vs. Water Company, 101 U. S., 274, 276; Manuel vs. Wulff, 152 U. S., 505, 510.

The act which declares an alien may convey to a citizen and make a good title, the act of 1884, was passed sixteen years ago, about the same length of time embraced in the period between 1850, when the Congress of the United States decided upon nonaction, and 1865, when the Supreme Court of the United States recognized what had been done and predicated its decision upon it.

You have invited the hardy pioneers of all countries to go into that inhospitable country in the arctic region, and you were bound under the law to give them protection, and now you propose to pass a law depriving those people of their rights; for that would be the effect of this radical change. This shows the importance of having such questions considered by the appropriate committee, the members of which are familiar with the conditions existing and with what may be required. This has not been committed to any such committee.

The laws governing mining claims in the United States for the last thirty-five years have been satisfactory to everybody. Why should they now be amended by the Committee on Territories in a bill to establish a civil code for Alaska? That matter, of course, is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Territories; but now it is proposed in that civil code that the mining rules and regulations shall be changed, and be changed in such a manner as to take from one man his property and give it to another.

Is it possible we have come to that? Have we arrived at such a condition in the Senate that we will take matters from the legitimate committee and allow no investigation? The Senate can not consider such things in detail in open session. Many Senators have business elsewhere and can not give the attention which the subject requires.

Whenever you say the mining laws, rules, and regulations under which we have lived for the last thirty-five years shall be changed without consideration by a committee, you do that which will create confusion and great hardship in that country; you undo the good work which has been done and with which everybody is satisfied.

Take your land laws. They have been administered in your Department here, and you have spent, until quite recently, from $175,000 to $300,000 a year sending out special agents to detect frauds. You have had nothing of that kind in mining cases. Such cases are turned over to the courts, which decide what persons are entitled to a particular property, and so there is no scandal about the settlement of our mining cases.

Suppose mining cases come here to be decided in Congress by special legislation, as you propose in this case, or were to be decided in the Departments by clerks on ex parte evidence; do you think our mining country would ever have been developed? Do you think we should have had the peace and prosperity which we have enjoyed? But those cases are settled by the local courts, where each party has a hearing; they do not come here at all, and justice is done.

It is now proposed to extend this law over Alaska. Why should not Alaska have the same laws which govern other parts of the country? Why should there be more restrictions upon people in the Arctic region than are imposed upon people elsewhere? If Norwegians and Finns and Laplanders have gone there, where it will be difficult for anybody to go, they should be encouraged; and we should protect everybody who will explore it, for as the result of their explorations there comes increased business to the millions, which adds immensely to the prosperity of the country.

The prosperity of which everybody is now boasting results from the thousands of millions of gold taken out in the last four years. Let us continue that prosperity, and cease talking about the Japs going there to mine. The Japs have not gone there, and they are not going there. The Norwegians, the Laplanders, the Finns, and those who are accustomed to that kind of a climate will go if anybody except American citizens go. American citizens are adventurous. The spirit which they display is most enviable. It is, I know, a hard thing to go and live in such a climate, and ninety-nine out of every hundred who go there die in poverty.

If here and there there is one who wins a prize, that prize will give employment to thousands, and will add immensely to the prosperity of the whole world. If they are willing to sacrifice themselves in this effort to find gold, why should we rob them of their property when they get there? I say this amendment would be downright robbery. It would be a violation of every principle of justice. It is retroactive legislation: and it takes one man's property and gives it to another. The Congress of the United States has never knowingly committed such an error, and never will, I hope.

I regret that there are not more Senators who will give attention to this matter, so as to know something about it; but I apprehend they will get knowledge of it after a while. The subject must be kept before them long enough to have them give attention to it before this outrage is committed.

There is no evidence that the jumpers ever took possession. The evidence is that they did not take possession at all. The owners have worked the mines and developed them, and were in possession of them when Mr. Lane bought, and Mr. Lane has been working them ever since. They simply recorded notices, and they came here and raised this controversy as to whether a judge should inquire whether the locators had legally declared their intention to become citizens of the United States contrary to the statute, contrary to the decisions, contrary to justice, contrary to every principle of right dealing that can be imagined.

There is nothing but wrong in this proposition. Such a thing has not been done in the last thirty-five years. The people have not asked for such legislation. What, then, is the object of it? It is simply to take one man's property and give it to another.

I should like to have the mining rules made more liberal. I have submitted the correspondence of the State Department with the Canadian authorities, and I have shown you that the Canadians consider that they are more liberal than we are. I have submitted the communication from the privy council at Ottawa upon this subject, from which it appears that they want good relations with this country. Why should we not be as liberal to them in Alaska as they have been to us?

Explorations ought to be free over the whole country. We want to persuade Russia to let our miners go there; we want to persuade England and Canada to let our miners go into their possessions. Our people have entered the Transvaal. The English have been more liberal in South Africa toward American miners than we have been toward any foreigners, and the Dutch Republics are equally liberal.

Many of our citizens made fortunes there, and they have contributed largely to the success of those enterprises; our engineers were employed there, and helped develop the mines, until they were producing $80,000,000 per annum of gold, which went into the treasury of the world, and vivified commerce all over the world. It was the liberality there exercised which enabled those great mines to be opened.

It is very unfortunate now that that source of supply is cut off, and we feel it very materially, but I hope the mines will be saved. I hope nothing will happen to close those mines permanently. We need them, and I hope they will soon be reopened. I hope soon to see the arctic region, cold as it is, filled up by those accustomed to that kind of life, and I hope to see the miners there given all the privileges they want to hunt in the arctic region and develop the treasure there which will benefit all.

As to real estate in this city and real estate all over the United States, and as to farm products, the prices have been advanced by the adventurous pioneer miners. Why not let well enough alone? Why not carry out the principles which actuated the correspondence between our Government and the Canadian government to have more liberal laws on this subject? Why not encourage the miners? Do not we get our benefit?

See how Seattle is growing up and all those cities on the Pacific coast, and how they are benefited by the immense trade which comes from the explorations of our miners. Why strike at it in this vital place? Why strike at those men who will go where you will not go, where few American citizens can go, on account of the severe climate? Why strike them down?

Why call it monopolizing? Monopolizing what? Monopolizing the icebergs of northern Alaska? They have been there during all the ages, and nobody ever thought of monopolizing them; but if men go there at the risk of their lives and discover precious metals by their hard labor and make better prices, they should be encouraged and not legislated against.

I protest against aspersing their characters. They are benefactors. Those men have been sneered at as Laplanders and Norwegians and sneered at as Japs; but if any Japs have gone there I do not know of it. To strike at them is to strike at your best friends and to do the grossest injustice conceivable. I protest that it ought not to be done. Leave the laws as they are; leave the titles vested as they are vested under these laws; do not disturb the old landmarks.

If you pass such legislation as is proposed, Canada will very promptly say to you, "We never did anything like that; we gave them every opportunity, and when complaints were made here of injustice we set those complaints aside." Let us be as liberal as Canada has been. I do not see why Americans can not be as liberal in their laws as Canada or any other country. The comparison the council makes between the laws of Canada and our laws does not look well for us when our people have been going into British Columbia to quartz mine for the last thirty or forty years without molestation.

It has been said that we must pass vindictive legislation of this kind and put all possible obstacles in the way of mining there, so as to secure it for American citizens who never think of going there. I tell you, Mr. President, this action is preposterous and dangerous. Do not do it.

INQUIRIES RELATIVE TO THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Philippines, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

In further response to the resolution of the Senate of January 17, 1900, requesting copies of communications between the Executive Departments of the Government and Aguinaldo or other persons undertaking to represent the people in arms against the United States in the Philippine Islands, together with other official documents relating to the Philippine Islands and the conduct and events of the insurrection against the authority of the United States in the Philippine Islands, and having reference to my message to the Senate of March 5, 1900 (Senate Document, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, No. 208), and to my message to the Senate of March 27, 1900 (Senate Document, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, No. 208, part 2), and that paragraph of the resolution of January 17, 1900, reading as follows:

"And that the President be further requested to communicate, without delay, so much of such information as is now in his possession or in that of any Department at Washington, without waiting to obtain so much of said information as may require considerable delay or communication with the Philippine Islands, and to communicate the remainder of the information as soon thereafter as it can be obtained"—

I transmit herewith the following additional papers:

First. Copies of English translations of certain documents found in insurgent records recently captured by our troops in the Philippine Islands, appended hereto, marked "I," and in continuation of the documents included under caption I of my message of March 27, 1900.

Second. Copies of English translations of certain documents recently captured by our troops in the Philippine Islands, containing Aguinaldo's instructions to the representative men of Iloilo who accompanied Gen. Marcus P. Miller on his expedition to that city, appended hereto, marked "II," and in continuation of the documents included under caption I of my message of March 5, 1900.

Third. Copies of English translations of documents recently captured by our troops in the Philippine Islands, containing information in regard to plans of the people in arms against the United States for the pillage of Manila, for risings in the city, or for the destruction of foreign property and the massacre of foreign residents. Said copies of documents are appended hereto, marked "III," and in continuation of the document included under caption V of my message of March 5, 1900.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 18, 1900.

GOVERNMENT OF PORTO RICO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The time remaining before the 1st day of May, when the act of April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," will take effect, appears to be insufficient for the careful inquiry and consideration requisite to the proper selection of suitable persons to fill the important civil offices provided for by the act. The powers of the present government will cease when the act takes effect, and some new authority will be necessary to enable the officers now performing the various duties of civil government in the island to continue the performance of those duties until the officers who are to perform similar duties under the new government shall have been appointed and qualified. That authority can not well be given at present by temporary appointments of the existing officers to positions under the act, for the reason that many of the existing officers are officers of the Army detailed to the performance of civil duties, and section 1222 of the Revised Statutes would prevent them from accepting such temporary appointments under the penalty of losing their commissions. The selection of the new officers and the organization of the new government under the act referred to will be accomplished with all practicable speed, but in order that it may be properly accomplished, I recommend the passage of a joint resolution to obviate the difficulty above stated.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 18, 1900.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, in the absence of objection.

Mr. FORAKER. To give effect to the recommendation the President has made in the message which has just been read, I offer the joint resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio introduces a joint resolution and asks for its present consideration. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution (S. R. 116) to provide for the administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico pending the appointment and qualification of the civil officers provided for in the act approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That until the officer to fill any office provided for by the act of April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," shall have been appointed and qualified, the officer or officers now performing the civil duties pertaining to such office may continue to perform the same under the authority of said act; and no officer of the Army shall lose his commission by reason thereof: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held to extend the time for the appointment and qualification of any such officers beyond the 1st day of August, 1900.

Mr. FORAKER. I withdraw the request for present consideration and ask that both the message and the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will both be printed and so referred, in the absence of objection.

CAROLINE WIENHIMER.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 3436) granting a pension to Caroline Wienhimer; and I ask that the House of Representatives be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 3436) granting a pension to Caroline Wienhimer was passed and moves that the bill be recalled from the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE DANFORD.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Friday next, the 20th instant, at half past 4 o'clock, I shall ask the Senate to consider resolutions relative to the life, character, and public services of the Hon. LORENZO DANFORD, late a Representative in Congress from Ohio.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH].

Mr. CARTER. I offer the substitute which I send to the desk for that amendment, in the hope that it may result in reconciling views and in bringing about speedy action on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be read.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest to the Senator that he had better let us vote on the amendment; and then, if he wants to add something, he can do it. I think we may prefer to first have a vote on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CARTER. I will do that if the Senator from Colorado prefers.

Mr. TELLER. I would rather vote on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota. When we dispose of that, the Senator can offer his amendment, if he thinks it necessary.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the purpose was to hasten the vote, and if such action will result in that desirable end I will withdraw the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH].

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement for the purpose of putting the Senate in possession of what I conceive to be the true facts in this case.

There is no doubt but what this amendment is intended to be retroactive. It is not intended to make a rule for the future; it is intended to operate on existing rights and existing conditions. It is as clear a piece of retroactive legislation as can be found anywhere. If there is any class of legislation that is odious to institutions existing under a republican form of government and under a Constitution such as ours, it is legislation that is known either as ex post facto or retroactive. An ex post facto law is a law which makes that criminal which was not criminal when the act was done. A retroactive law is a law which attempts to create rights in reference to contracts which did not exist at the time the contracts were made.

In this case it is attempted by this legislation, Mr. President, to give certain persons who, in common parlance out West—and we may as well call things by their right names—are known as claim jumpers, and to equip them with legal weapons by which they can gain an advantage that they have not now under existing law.

It is practically admitted here, I believe, by Senators who have discussed this question, by the Senator from Colorado, the Senator from Nevada, and the Senator from Wisconsin, who are familiar with mining law, that foreigners can explore and locate mining claims; that no one can question the right that they have thus acquired by exploration and discovery, except the Government of the United States, and that they have such possessory right and such possessory title in the mines which they discover that they can transfer title to third parties.

I imagine another thing, Mr. President. If those people who have made these discoveries, who have located these mines, and made these explorations in Alaska had been native-born citizens, I do not think anyone would have had the hardihood to come in here and ask for retroactive legislation in reference to them; but now these claimants come here, and they attack these locations and explorations on the ground that those people are foreigners. They call them Laplanders, as though there were something odious in that, Mr. President. As a matter of fact—and it is a matter of history, and you may see it in magazine articles—the first discoveries of gold at Cape Nome were by Swede missionaries, who had gone there two or more years before, and located at what is called Golofnin Bay. They had located there, and one of the missionaries, a Swede, had been there a great many years.

Through one of his Indian converts he first got information about gold at Cape Nome. That led to the exploration; and here we have in this Senate document, which was referred to this afternoon, a statement under oath from Dr. Kittilsen, a native-born citizen of Dane County, Wis., the county where the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] lives, and he and I know Dr. Kittilsen well; we know his father; he comes of a good family, and is a reliable and trustworthy man. He states in his affidavit the following facts:

That he is a citizen of the United States, and has been a resident of the Territory of Alaska since 1896—

He was there two years before the discovery of gold at Cape Nome.

that he arrived at Cape Nome, Alaska, about October, 1898—

Now, listen to this—that prior to that time there were three men located at Cape Nome; two of them were Swedes by birth, but had been in the United States some ten to fifteen years; the third was a Norwegian. Two other persons went there with me; one of them a Laplander and one an American citizen.

There is the whole basis, in the first instance, of the cry of "Laplanders." Out of the six individuals who first made the discovery and located at Cape Nome only one was a Laplander. Those Swedes were missionaries who had been ten or fifteen years in that country, and they were the original locators. In addition to this, there were some more people who came there, who were brought there by an agent of the Government.

The Senator from Montana has conjured up a sort of Japanese or Chinese nightmare. There are no Japanese or Chinese holding any of these claims at present. The men whose claims it is attempted to reach by this legislation belong to four classes of people. A part of them are Laplanders, a part of them are Finns, a part of them are Norwegians, and a part of them are Swedes. How did these people come to be there? Where were they from? Those Laplanders were brought there by the Government, through its agent, Dr. Jackson, of the Department of Education.

In 1897 there were some whaling vessels wrecked upon the coast there. The Government started out to send relief to them, and for the purpose of sending the relief as expeditiously as possible they conceived the idea of going to Lapland, of procuring reindeer, and sending Laplanders out there with the expedition for the purpose of relieving those whalers. One or two years before that time Dr. Jackson had brought some other Laplanders there with a view of utilizing the reindeer in that country. He had made a beginning of it. The members of the first lot he brought there are not affected by this legislation, as they did not make any locations. Under the arrangement made with them it was provided that after they had stayed a year they were to be returned to their native country. But when Dr. Jackson went in 1897 to procure a lot of 500 reindeer for Alaska, he took special pains to arrange with those men who came with the reindeer that they were to remain there permanently, to make this country their home. I want to read something on that subject.

Mr. SHOUP. I desire to inquire of the Senator what authority, if any, Dr. Jackson had for saying to those men he brought over with the reindeer that they should stay there and become citizens of the United States?

Mr. NELSON. I will answer the question. He did not say that they were to become citizens of the United States, but he said he wanted them to stay permanently—to make this their home.

The Government of the United States sent its agent over to a foreign country to procure reindeer; to secure people to bring them over here and to take charge of them. He represented a certain state of facts to those people, and they having relied upon his representations, would it not be taking a narrow and a pettifogging view of the case to say that Dr. Jackson did not have authority to make such an arrangement?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator from Minnesota has laid a great deal of stress upon the fact, as he claims——

Mr. NELSON. I yielded for a question.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to put a question to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator has laid great stress upon the fact, as he claims, that the aliens who are now claiming the mines in the Cape Nome district were the discoverers of that district——

Mr. NELSON. Those Laplanders?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Those Laplanders and others.

Mr. NELSON. I will give you the list of names from Dr. Kittilsen's affidavit.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. If the Senator will permit me—I know he wants to be right in this matter—and I am sure I do. I do not want to do anybody any injustice in any form; but I have here a document which has been printed by the Senate, a statement of the president of the Law and Order League, of Alaska, signed by 52 members of that league, consisting of some of the best men in that country. I desire to read just briefly, if the Senator will allow, from this document, and then will ask leave to print. This document goes on to say:

About the 25th of April, 1898, gold was discovered in this section by a party of four men, consisting of A. P. Mandaunt, H. L. Blake, D. B. Libby, and L. F. Melsing.

* * * * * * *

That the aforesaid H. L. Blake and one O. H. Holtberg——

Mr. NELSON. Is he a Laplander?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not know what he is.

Mr. NELSON. He is a Swede.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (continuing)— made the first discovery of gold during the summer of 1898, in what is now known as Cape Nome mining district, and afterwards imparted the information of such discoveries to their supposed friends, H. P. Anderson and H. E. Carlson, the Swedish missionaries, respectively at Golovin Bay and Unalaklet, and it was agreed between them that they would return to said district together at a later date and organize a mining district. The aforesaid missionaries, disregarding their promise, secretly and clandestinely and unknown to the said Blake, organized a party consisting of E. Lindbloom, E. Linderberg (who is employed by the United States Government in the care of the reindeer station at Eaton), W. C. Price—

A relative of Mr. Lane, I believe—and E. N. Kittelsen, and 12 Laplanders (whose names are unknown) in the United States Government employ, and sent them to Cape Nome to locate mining claims in the aforesaid Cape Nome mining district and organize the same, and they did so locate many claims and organize said district.

I thought it was necessary in this debate to show that there is good and sufficient evidence here on the authority of reputable men from Alaska that these gentlemen, Lindbloom and Linderberg, did not discover the Cape district, but that it was discovered by Blake and this man Holtberg.

Mr. STEWART. There is not a particle of evidence that Blake was ever there. This is hearsay from some miners two or three hundred miles off. No man says he was on the ground as the other men did.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from North Dakota that he was not exactly fair. It was not a question. It was more than that. It was interjecting a statement. I desire to say to him that the so-called law and order league, of which he speaks and which is referred to in the document he has had printed, is simply an organization—I may as well call things by their right names—which came there, and its purpose was to jump these claims and drive out the Swedes and Norwegians and Laplanders. I shall come to that point by and by as I go along. I do not propose at this time to be diverted from what I am about to state.

Now, who are the Finns and Laplanders that our Government got into this country? Who are the people who went there and for what purpose did they go? In the northern part of Norway and Sweden and the extreme northern part of Russia, north of the province of Finland and within the limits of the arctic circle, is a dreary waste of icebergs and snow. No vegetation of any consequence is there except moss and a few stunted birch. The country would be utterly unpopulated and unsettled and of no use if it were not for the Finns or Laplanders who have settled in that country. That whole country has for years and years been occupied by the Laplanders. Their chief property consists of herds of reindeer. The reindeer furnish them their milk, their butter, their cheese, skins for their clothing, skins for bedding, skins to cover tents with, and they furnish meat. A man's wealth is measured by the number of reindeer he owns.

There are two classes of those Lapps, one class known as Mountain Lapps, living up in the interior, who herd the reindeer, taking care of them summer and winter. Then there is another class living near the seacoast, near the fiords and bays. They live partly by fishing and partly by keeping reindeer. In that country these Lapps have settled, and they have made use of that country for many hundreds of years.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator if he has any information as to the success of the experiment in transferring reindeer from Lapland to Alaska, and whether they are multiplying or likely to subserve the same uses there that they do in their native habitat. In other words, we have spent a good deal of money on this reindeer experiment, and it seems to have gotten us into a row over gold. I should like to get at the facts, if they are within the reach of anyone, as to what the result of the transfer of the reindeer from Lapland to Alaska has been.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to a question of order, which is whether it is in order, when the question of miners' rights and the rights of aliens is being discussed, to introduce a discussion of the subject of the acclimatization of reindeer in Alaska?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK of Wyoming in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota yielded to the interruption.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me to answer the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NELSON. I was going to suggest to the Senator from South Carolina, as an answer to it, that it would be about as apt as it sometimes is to discuss the negro question down South and the right of suffrage.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no purpose of trying to divert the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I do not refer to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want some information, and he seems to know about this matter. I sympathize with his object.

Mr. NELSON. I will explain it, if the Senator will listen to me. I will come to it directly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to get a chance to answer the Senator from New Hampshire. He is always interjecting something that does not belong here, and I have as many rights here as anybody.

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina to answer the question.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from South Carolina will allow me before he jumps onto me, as he says he proposes to do, I have not interjected anything. The Senator from South Carolina interjected the Siberian reindeer into this discussion about miners' rights, and I simply say that it is out of order, or it ought to be out of order, and if the Chair shows the wisdom and discretion that I believe exist in his brain he will so rule.

Mr. TILLMAN. Without waiting for the Chair to say anything on that subject, I will state that the Senator from New Hampshire has interjected himself into this discussion, and I think he is just as foreign to it as anything else.

Mr. NELSON. The Government, or that part of the Government which represents and has for years represented education in Alaska, conceived the idea (I think the senior Senator from Colorado, perhaps, was the means of having the first steps taken in Congress to secure legislation for that purpose) of introducing reindeer into Alaska. In order to get the reindeer there and to make a success of their introduction, it was necessary to get people who live in Lapland, who are accustomed to reindeer and know how to take care of them, know how to break them in, how to hitch them up and drive them, for the reindeer of Lapland are not only used for meat and drink and clothing and all that, but they are also used for transportation. They are the beasts of burden. They are the travelers of the country.

The representative of our Government in 1897 went to Lapland to bring these people here with their reindeer. In the province of Lapland, mixed in with the Laplanders, there are a few Norwegians and a few Finns. The Norwegians occupy pretty much the same relation to the Laplanders of that country that the whites do to the colored people down South. A few of the Norwegians and Swedes who were mixed in there with the Laplanders came over with the deer. Dr. Jackson made an arrangement with them by which they were to come here and stay permanently. He rushed them across the country as rapidly as he could. When they got to Port Townsend, Puget Sound, a number of them, to show their good faith, went before the clerk of the court at Port Townsend—the clerk of the United States court, I believe, or a State court—and declared their intention to become citizens.

There were a few others who wanted to do it, but Dr. Jackson hurried them along and said, "You can have that done in Alaska." They went up to St. Michael; and when they got to St. Michael, they went before the United States court commissioner. Dr. Jackson, an American citizen, whom you all know, thought it was legal. He advised those people, some of them Swedes, some of them Norwegians, some Laplanders, to go before the court commissioner and take out their first papers, as we call them; declare their intention. They did it in good faith, and imagined they complied with the law. Unfortunately under our law a person can not declare his intention before a United States court commissioner. He must do it before the clerk of the court or the judge of the court. That is the misfortune of these people, and it is sought here to take advantage of the fact that these people had not declared their intention in a proper way.

The Laplanders would never have come to this country. They are not an emigrating people. There is no more danger of their coming here than there is of the people of this country moving to Lapland, where they come from. They occupy the country within the Arctic Circle, in the Scandinavian countries, and they are never known to emigrate farther south. Occasionally, in the middle of the summer, they will drive their herds down on the high mountains in the southern part of Sweden and Norway and pasture them for a brief period, but they never go there to live. They keep in their own country and their own climate.

Is not the introduction of reindeer into that country a laudable purpose? Is it not of interest to this country to get the class of people who can live in that climate? The miners go in there, and in the nature of things there are only three or four months in the year in which they can do much of anything in that country. It is only during the short summer. If we expect to get any permanent residents in that country who will live there as we live here, who will live there in winter, these are just the people we need. And, what is more, if we can make a success of introducing the reindeer in that country, it will be a great blessing to the miners and to everybody else who go to live there.

The reindeer will furnish the people the best transportation facilities in the winter, better than anything else in that icy cold country, and they will also furnish the people with skin for their clothing and for their overcoats and for their gloves and everything else, and then supply them with an abundance of good meat. We can not introduce our cattle there and make a success of it. Perhaps among some of the little coves and bays along the southern shore on the seacoast they can raise a few sheep and a few cattle, but in the interior they can not raise any cattle or sheep. The only food animals that can successfully be raised in that country are the reindeer.

Now, when we brought those people there with this laudable purpose, with the view of introducing the reindeer industry there, encouraged them to come, having gone to their own country and got them, I ask why in the name of equity and justice and common sense ought we under these conditions to discriminate against them. I think people who have come under the conditions under which the Laplanders and the Finns and the Swedes came with the reindeer, and on those terms, ought to be treated, to all intents and purposes, as though they were of our own flesh and our own blood.

I have been surprised at my friend the Senator from North Dakota. He first introduced this amendment in its original form to cut off even those who had declared their intention to become citizens. It was afterwards modified, and then in the first statement he made in the Senate he would have it appear that all these people were nothing but Laplanders, a horde of Laplanders, who had come over here and were trenching upon the rights of native-born citizens, and the word "alien" seemed to roll like a sweet morsel.

What does Dr. Jackson say? Let us see what he said. Let us see what a great danger there is in this matter:

Forty three Lapps, 15 Norwegians, and 10 Finns, making 68 men, were brought from Lapland in the spring of 1898, under contract with the War Department for one year from February 1, 1898.

I read from Dr. Jackson's affidavit.

Of the 68 men—

He refers to these men—in the employ of the War Department only one asked to resign before the expiration of his term of service; the other 67 remained until their contract term of service expired, on January 31, 1899, when 40 of those who were discharged from the service went to the mines at Cape Nome.

Of the party that took up claims at the mines I am informed and believe 28 were Norwegians and Finns and but 14 were Lapps.

Who are the Finns? That is another class.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Can he tell how many claims each one of these people took?

Mr. NELSON. I have no means to answer the question, but would that cut any figure if they were native-born citizens?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I simply asked for information.

Mr. NELSON. I put the question to the Senator from Montana, or the Senator from North Dakota, or the Senator from South Dakota, if these were American citizens—native-born citizens—would it cut any figure how many claims they took? If it would not in their case, why should you make a different rule in the case of these people, who have come here under the conditions I have indicated.

Who are the Finns? I will tell you who they are. The province of Finland is situate north of the city of St. Petersburg. There are about two and a half million people. It was a country that was originally settled and colonized by the Swedes over four hundred years ago, when the Finns were barbarians. It remained under the control of Sweden as a province—a colony of Sweden—for nearly four hundred years, until the beginning of the nineteenth century—I think 1807 or 1808—when Russia acquired the country. They became civilized. The Swedes Christianized them. They all became Lutherans. They became an educated and intelligent people. There was a great admixture with Swedes, and that educated them. Many of them, or most of them, read and spoke the Swedish language. Their great poets and great authors all wrote in the Swedish language.

They had a government of their own, and when finally Sweden was compelled to relinquish the province of Finland to Russia at the beginning of this century, they were permitted until within the last year to retain their own government, and the Czar of Russia simply called himself the Grand Duke of the Duchy of Finland. But lately, within the last year or two, the Russian Czar, for reasons of his own, and his council have seen fit to deprive them of the rights. They had an autonomous government. They had their own army, their own legislature, their own mint, and their own government almost as independent of Russia as one of our States is of the other States of the Union. All that has, to a large extent, been taken away from them within the last year or two, and no doubt many of you have seen what the Russian Empire has done to the poor Finns.

From the province of Finland a great many people have emigrated into the northern part of Sweden and into the northern part of Norway and settled in the country intervening between the Lapps and the Norwegians and the Swedes. Many men of the Finns have come to America. They are a tall, straight race, about the same stature and size and build as the ordinary Norwegians and Swedes. They are, in their original state, light haired, blue-eyed, fair complexioned, with broad faces, stubby noses, and high cheek bones. They are energetic, bright, able people. In the days of Sweden's greatness, when Gustavus Adolphus was the head of the Protestant army in Germany and fought for the cause of Protestantism, some of the best regiments he had in the Swedish army were composed of Finns, and at the battle of Lützen, when Gustavus Adolphus was killed and the Swedish line of battle was almost wavering, it was a regiment of Finnish cavalry that restored the order of battle and gave the victory to the Swedes.

It is the descendants of those people who have come here. My friend the Senator from Michigan knows them well. They are to be found in the copper and iron mines in the northern part of Michigan. They go there and work a half a dozen years or so in the mines, accumulate a little money, and then they go out in the northern part of Wisconsin, Montana, Idaho, and those States, and buy farms and become farmers. They do not come to this country to make a little money and go back to the old country. They are all Protestants, and one good thing about them—I do not know how my friends on the other side will look at it—is that they are nearly all good Republicans. These are some of the outcasts who have gone to Cape Nome and whom it is sought to legislate against in this bill. We are likely to have a great many of them come this year on account of the change that has taken place in their own country—Finland. They are likely to come here in large force, and they are just the men to become permanent settlers in a country like Alaska.

I am somewhat acquainted, Mr. President, with the Swedes and the Norwegians and the Finns. They are pretty thick in the Western country. I think the verdict of almost everybody is that they have not been dangerous or harmful. I think they have had as much to do as any other class of people with the building up of that country. I think that is true in States like North Dakota, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. They are good, law-abiding citizens; I think as law-abiding as any there are in Montana. When people have come here in good faith, as these have come, under these conditions, we ought not to take advantage of a mere technicality and say, "You ought to be frozen out because you have not declared your intention, or because you declared your intention before a court commissioner instead of the clerk of the court."

Why should we resort to a species of retroactive legislation that we would not have the hardihood or the cheek to invoke against native-born citizens? The spirit of the United States of America, ever since it became an independent nation, has been contrary to all such notions. This country has always up to the present day extended its arms and held its doors open to the people of the Old World, and when they have come here and behaved as good citizens America has received them with open arms and treated them as though they were to the manner born.

While I make this statement as a matter of justice to those people, I have this to say, and I do not want any of you to feel that I am unpatriotic: If you desire to fence in Alaska and keep this class of people out, if you want to keep the Finns and the Laplanders and the Swedes and the Norwegians out of Alaska for the future, I shall make no objection and shall put no obstruction to it; but when people have gone there under the conditions that those people have, all I ask is that you treat them just as you would treat them if they were native-born citizens. That is all I ask. If my friend the Senator from Montana will limit his amendment to cover future cases he can fence out everybody in creation, from the angel Gabriel down to his Japanese and Chinese.

In response to the question of the Senator from South Carolina

[Mr. TILLMAN], I am unable to state exactly what success there has been in the introduction of reindeer in Alaska. I think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who, as far as legislation is concerned, may be considered the father of that kind of legislation, would be able to give the Senator from South Carolina more information on that subject than I can. My understanding is that to a large extent it has been a great success, and I think in course of time the hills and valleys of Alaska can be covered with reindeer as they are in Lapland, in the northern part of Norway and Sweden.

I have not any doubt about it, because the kind of pasturage is there. The reindeer live upon a kind of moss in summer and winter. They do not put up any hay for reindeer. In summer they get at the moss easily. In winter they have to paw off the snow, but they get at it even where the snow is 3, 4, and 5 feet deep. It is no more difficult for the reindeer to subsist and get along in Alaska than in Lapland. There is the same kind of food, the same climate in Alaska that there is in Lapland. In fact, Lapland is farther north. I think the center of Alaska is at 65° north latitude, while nearly all of Lapland is north of the Arctic Circle and between 65° and 70°.

There is one other matter that I forgot to state, and I want to state it here. I want to tell it just as I understand it. I have talked with this Dr. Kittilsen. One of the missionaries, Mr. Anderson, a Lutheran missionary, came down in the early part of the winter and saw me about this matter. What did these gentlemen say to me? It is not here in the record, but I feel I must tell the Senate what these gentlemen told me. They said: "We happened to be the first locators there. We got good claims. As soon as it was found out, there was a rush in there, and then they wanted to jump our claims; they raised a hue and cry and said, 'Damn Lapps, damn Norwegians, damn Finns, damn Swedes, these foreigners.'" And they organized what they called this league, and they attempted to drive those Swedes and Lapps and Finns and Norwegians out of the country. But the United States officers there, civil and military, protected them, and that is one of the complaints we have. Petitions are here asking for the removal of the United States military officer in command of that district because the civil officers and the military officers, with troops of the United States, protected these people out there in their rights; and now these claim jumpers come here to Congress and want us to give them legislation and fortify them in a manner in which they were never fortified before.

One of those men who came to see me told me, with tears in his eyes, how they had persecuted him. One of these men, Mr. Linderberg, a Norwegian, who came with these Laplanders and whose affidavit is here, told how they had attempted to drive him out of the country; and to-day in this very Chamber a gentleman informed me that they have organized what they call a Law and Order League, a certain class of miners out there on the Pacific coast somewhere, to go up and drive these people out of the country; and he intimated to me that unless legislation were passed in the interest of these men, there would be bloodshed up there. I do not believe anything of the kind. I believe the great mass of the American miners who are up in that country are law-abiding citizens and will do what is just and fair; and I think that this is simply a small lawless element that is trying to take advantage of the exploration and discovery of these mines. I sincerely trust that the Senate will not aid them in their enterprise.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota seemed to object to my asking him a perfectly relevant question.

Mr. NELSON. No; I did not object.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to disabuse the Senator's mind of any idea that I had such a purpose. I have listened with a great deal of interest to his recital of the habits of the reindeer and the desirability of getting them over there, and I wanted to know the result of the experiment. I will ask the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to tell us just what we have got for the money we spent in sending to Lapland to get these men and their animals, to carry them over there, and what they can do with them in this Territory of ours.

I want to say to him that I sympathize absolutely with his idea that these Laplanders up there have as many rights as anybody else, and that if there is any legislation necessary here, it ought to be to protect them rather than to have the legal status which now exists changed.

I know nothing about the merits of this case except in a general way as I gather it from the debate. But it seems that unless we now change the status by some ex post facto legislation, or by some law that will be retroactive in its effect, these Laplanders and those who have purchased from them have rights that the courts will adjudicate; and I do not see any reason why we should not let the courts settle this business and go on and finish this Alaska bill, and take this amendment by the nape of the neck and kick it out of the Senate.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it is quite impossible to reconcile all the rumors relative to Alaska, and particularly to the gold fields, to anything like the truth.

It has been the purpose of the committee having this bill in charge from the beginning to provide a system of law that would be universally applicable and would not invade any existing or vested rights. When the bill was presented upon the floor the Senator from North Dakota and other Senators objected to section 73 of the bill, which provides that—

> The title to any lands heretofore conveyed shall not be questioned or in any manner affected by reason of the alienage of any person from or through whom such title may have been derived.

The preceding section gave to aliens the right to hold property in Alaska irrespective of any law heretofore passed or existing. Objecting to this section 73, the Senator from North Dakota presented his amendment. The discussion upon that amendment has taken a somewhat wide range and has been characterized by a dealing in terms of opprobium, crimination, and recrimination, with which we have nothing whatever to do in this Chamber.

The discussion has demonstrated one fact very clearly, that certain Senators believe that an alien, without declaring his intention to become a citizen of the United States, has as good a right to locate a mining claim on the public domain of the United States as any citizen of the country, whether native born or naturalized.

In 1872 the present mining law was passed, and by section 2319 of the Revised Statutes, which formed a part of that law, locations upon the public domain of mineral land were limited to persons who were citizens of the United States, or had declared their intention to become citizens. That law was uniformly construed by the local courts in the mining States to permit and to allude to a litigation to raise the question of citizenship as to a locator. Later on the Supreme Court of the United States held that a party to a litigation could not raise the question of the citizenship of the locator; that that question could only be raised by the Government of the United States.

Now, as a result of the law and the construction of it by the Supreme Court, it is contended that an alien may, notwithstanding the statute fails to give him the right, locate a mining claim, and his right to its possession may not be questioned by any citizen or by any power except the sovereign power, the Government itself. This I do not believe to be in conformity with the settled legislative policy of the Government. I believe that when the United States Congress, in 1872, passed a law providing that mining claims could be located only by citizens or persons who had declared their intention to become citizens, it did not intend to give the right to aliens who had not declared their intention to make mining locations. And yet if the Government is the only authority capable of raising the question, then the mining location may be made in violation of law, and possession may be continued indefinitely unless the Government of the United States objects.

Now, let me state the only question to be decided. I do not think the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota raises it fairly or limits the issue sufficiently. It is this: Shall it henceforth be the settled policy of the United States to reverse the act of 1872 and permit persons to locate claims upon the public domain under the mining laws who are not citizens and have not declared their intention to become citizens? If that is to be the settled policy, let the Congress so decide. If, on the contrary, it is desired that we adhere to the law as passed in 1872, that only citizens or persons who have declared their intention to become citizens shall be permitted to locate mining claims on the public domain, then we must provide that in any litigation concerning the title to a mining claim any party in interest may put the citizenship question in issue. At present, in the face of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, a party to the record can not do this.

I suggest as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota an amendment which will interfere with no vested right, which will interfere with no existing litigation, and will not, if the views of the Senator from Nevada are correct, result in a change of anybody's title. The amendment is brief. Permit me to read it:

> That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as changing the existing mining laws of the United States, but in any suit, action, or proceeding hereafter commenced involving the validity of an unpatented mining location on the public domain, any party alleging an interest in the subject-matter may put the competency of the locator in issue, and the court shall determine whether the locator was a citizen or had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States at the time the location was made.

Now, in order to reach the persons referred to by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] as having in good faith declared their intention to become citizens of the United States before a commissioner, who was not authorized by law to accept such declaration, I am perfectly willing to accept an amendment to this amendment which shall, in so far as mining locations are concerned, validate that act, which was irregular and illegal, so as to give them the benefit of an act which they performed in good faith. I do not see any objection to that. If those persons who came in from Finland and Norway and Sweden and Lapland desired to declare their intention, but through some mishap or ignorance on their part failed to appear before the proper officer, it is a proper subject for remedial legislation on the part of Congress in my opinion. It is useless here to undertake to settle questions of dispute concerning what happened 8,000 miles from here. We can only deal with principles.

If it is the view of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] that henceforth persons who take not sufficient interest in our Government to declare intention to become a part of its citizenship may locate the public domain of the United States and hold it under the mining laws of the country, then upon the Senate and the Congress may rest the burden and the credit.

Mr. President, I for one would not extend to any man of foreign birth, unwilling to declare his intention to become a citizen, the right to take gold from the public domain of the United States no more than I would permit him to go upon our public domain and take up a homestead without first declaring his intention to become a citizen.

The ownership of the soil of every country chiefly vests in the citizens of the country. Birds of passage, having no interest in our institutions, accepting no obligations to fight under our flag when the flag needs defense, should not be permitted all the time and everywhere to enjoy the same privileges we accord to our citizens of native birth and to those well-meaning persons of foreign birth who desire to become a part of our body politic. The declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States is not a drastic prerequisite to the enjoyment of the benefits of citizenship. It is not an unreasonable request for the Government to make. It has not been so regarded.

I believe, Mr. President, that when the sober judgment of Congress shall have been taken upon this subject it will be in favor of the American miner, native born or naturalized, or who has declared his intention to become a citizen. In the State I have the honor to represent there are hundreds of miners of foreign birth, born in all parts of Europe. I said hundreds, yea, thousands. Perhaps one-third of the population of the State were born abroad. Not a single solitary individual in the entire citizenship of that State, which was first to send an organized regiment into the field in the Spanish war, would to-night for one moment contend that persons of foreign birth, taking not sufficient interest in our institutions to declare intention to become citizens, should go into the mountains of Montana and enjoy the same rights and privileges accorded to the people who are a part of its citizenship, a part of its electorate, whether native born or naturalized.

All there is to this amendment here presented is embodied in the mere statement that it gives to parties contesting over the right to hold parts of the public domain the right to question the other man's citizenship. If the Senator from Minnesota will prepare an amendment that will embody the thought he so feelingly expressed that these Finns, Laplanders, Norwegians, and other persons who went in there and declared their intention to become citizens before the notary public or the commissioner, I should be glad to accept it, because it seems to be just. There is an immeasurable distance between that remediable proposition and the one insisted upon by the Senator from Nevada, that henceforth, regardless of citizenship, every alien may locate and hold claims upon the public domain of the United States under our mining laws. To that proposition I am unalterably opposed.

Since it has been sprung in the Senate and so earnestly insisted upon, it is the duty of the Senate to settle the policy here and now. It is not complicated. It is a bare question of public policy: Shall we allow persons of foreign birth who have not declared their intention to become citizens of the United States an unlimited right, except as to the Government itself, to locate mining claims on the public domain? If you believe we should, reverse the policy of over thirty years and let us start out upon a new departure and give full notice to all the peoples of all the world that whatsoever we have in our public domain of treasure may be shared by all, without reference to their allegiance to our flag.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to assure the Senator from Montana that under a claim of zeal for the American miners he is not going to succeed in getting the Senate of the United States to engage in settling any mining disputes between the people who are here demanding this legislation for that purpose and for nothing else——

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I resent that statement as unauthorized and unwarranted.

Mr. TELLER. I decline to be interrupted just at this moment.

Mr. CARTER. The amendment—I call the Senator's attention—relates to——

Mr. TELLER. The Senator has assumed, without the slightest reason for it, that I want to change the mining law. Mr. President, I have said here that I do not want to change the mining law; and I do not intend that it shall be changed on a statute of this kind if I can prevent it.

Mr. President, I know something about what this means. If the Senator thinks that he can, by his attack upon us, make it appear that we are in favor of repealing the law that exists and change front on this question, he will find he is mistaken. No one proposes to change the law that I know of except the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Montana. They propose to do it at the demand of a certain class of disreputable scalawags who invade every mining camp on this continent and who are known as mine jumpers.

Mr. CARTER. They are just ordinary American citizens.

Mr. TELLER. It does not make any difference whether they are citizens or not, they are the men who go out and wait until some hardy miner, whether he be citizen or whether he be not, has discovered something, and then they attempt to steal it. We have had trouble with such people for forty years in the part of the country in which I live.

Now, Mr. President, we do not propose, I repeat, to change the law. If these people have no right to this land, the courts are open to the men who have attempted to jump it from them. What the Senator proposes is to change the law so that the men who have not got any standing in court can get it. That is what his amendment will do, and it is no answer to our objection to say that the Senator from Colorado wants to change front and let the whole world, the foreign world, gobble up the mining lands of the United States.

Mr. President, from 1848 to 1862 there was no law, either made by miner or made by any legislative body on this continent, that made a distinction, as to the man who took a mining claim, between a citizen and a foreigner. California was settled with thousands of foreigners, taking the mining land and extracting from it the riches that went into the country and made it prosperous and happy. The same thing was done in the camp in which I lived; and I repeat, until 1866 nobody heard of limiting the appropriation of mining lands to citizens and excluding aliens.

Mr. President, no harm came to the country, and the American miner did not complain. In that law it is provided that no man shall take it unless he is a citizen, and the Government of the United States has the power at any hour that it sees fit to put that law in force and take it away from the alien if he attempts to appropriate it.

The act of 1866 limiting appropriation of mining claims to citizens was unchanged until the act of 1897.

Then, if I mistake not, with the assistance of the Senator from Montana, this act of 1897 was passed which has been read here. Passed why, Mr. President? Because a law had slipped through here, which nobody thought would apply to mining claims, to prevent the appropriation of the agricultural lands of this country by foreigners in great tracts—not in single quarter sections, but in great tracts. When it was found that the miner could not sell his claim to a foreigner, then there arose a demand in the Senator's community, as in mine, that there should be a change of this law, and then this law of 1897 was put on the statute book and has been since in effect.

Mr. President, if there has been any change of law, the Senator has had his hand in it. I never saw the law and never heard of it until this debate began. What does it provide? It provides that a foreigner who is a bona fide resident of a Territory, shall have the same right exactly as a citizen has as to owning mining claims, and under that law these men have taken property in Alaska.

I want to say to the Senator here and to the Senate that I do not believe the time has come when the American Senate is going to take out of the courts that question and attempt to try it here.

If the American people are afraid of foreign domination in mining lands, it is the fault of the Administration, whatever it may be, that they do not come in here and put in force the law which provides for office-found, or what is equivalent to that, an escheat.

Why, Mr. President, the law has been from time immemorial that a man's title can not be questioned because he is a foreigner until office-found, and the Supreme Court have so held distinctly and repeatedly. I challenge the statement the Senator made the other night, that there has been anywhere in the United States under the mining law any system of jurisprudence which denied foreigners the right to take and to hold until office-found, except for a short time. I know what the decision was in Montana, and I know what a district court held in Colorado; but it was reversed.

Mr. CARTER. That is what I contended.

Mr. TELLER. Yes, that is what the Senator contended; but the Senator contended more. He contended that there had been a practice in this country that foreigners could not take and could not hold. I do not think that it has been held in any community, except in the cases the Senator cited, that foreigners could not take and hold until the Government questioned their title, and in this act of 1897 it is ex industria provided that when the Government shall assail that title a man is not robbed of his property.

What does the Senator want to do? Does he want these men who have got a paper title, who have never put their hands on these claims, to be allowed to go into court and raise the question as to the title of these men who have, after much labor perhaps, created great value in the claim, when the statute of the United States, when it escheats the property, declares that the money the property brings shall go back to the man who holds it in contravention of law? This statute provides that if a man holds a claim in contravention of law, he may sell it to any man that he pleases, and the title is good.

Mr. President, the Senator's amendment will raise the question in the courts, give a standing in court to these men, these blackmailers—for that is what they are. In ninety-nine cases out of one hundred when a man puts his claim on another's, he is a blackmailer and a thief. It has been the curse of the mining camps, ever since we have had a mining camp, that this class of men were allowed to go unhanged, and in many camps in which I have been, Mr. President, the people in their might have sometime said to those fellows, "You get out of this camp;" and they have got out.

Mr. President, let these people go to the courts if they have a claim. If by filing a preemption claim, as we call it, over the possession, which the court has said is no claim whatever—if any court can be found that will sustain such a claim, let them establish their claim there. We ought not to legislate here in a way to give them any advantage which they do not now have.

Why does the Senator want to legislate in this way if he does not propose to give these people more than they are now entitled to? He is not willing to accept what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has said he would be willing to accept; that is, to apply the proposed law to claims which shall be located hereafter. No, Mr. President, the Senator is not willing to do that.

Mr. CARTER. Is the Senator willing to do that?

Mr. TELLER. I am not willing to do that. I think when I state to the Senate why I am not willing to do that, the Senate will see that it ought not to be done.

There is a class of men in the mining country who are known as prospectors. They are a class who have grown up with the country; they are sui generis; they go wherever they hear that there is a new mining camp. If you start a story in the mining regions that there is a new rich camp 50 miles or 100 miles or 500 miles away, you will see the prospectors gathering together, getting their pack animals and horses ready; and away they go. Why, Mr. President, it has been said, I think, a thousand times that they were only happy when hunting a claim. When they find one, they look around immediately for some man to whom they can transfer it. They never expect to do any more work than to find a claim. They are the men who uncover the hidden riches, who enrich thousands of other people, but rarely get rich themselves. They are deserving and worthy people; and they render immense benefit to the country by their industry and their enterprise. They are the men who transmit, I may say, the inchoate title, which ripens ultimately into a fee-simple title from the Government.

But, Mr. President, you can not inquire when you go to buy a claim if the locator of the claim was a citizen. How can you determine that question? To what confusion would it lead you, owing to the frequent transfer of these claims? I may say that no community would be prosperous if mining claims could not be transferred from the original prospector, who has not the money to develop them, to the man who has got the funds to develop them. How can you determine whether the man is a foreigner or not? He may have an American name. He may be Jones or Smith. He may sell the claim to a man whom I know. I go to buy it; and I inquire of him, "Was your prospector a citizen of the United States?" "Certainly he was." The presumption ought to be that he is a citizen. But, Mr. President, suppose it is found out under this provision, which the Senator is anxious to incorporate into the statute, that the man was not a citizen; then I have bought a claim which may have passed through perhaps half a dozen persons since its original location, and the question of citizenship is raised. That is what the amendment of the Senator from Montana, whether he wants to or not, will do. That ought not to be done.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Is it not true that before the claim will be patented by the United States the proof of citizenship of the locator must be made?

Mr. TELLER. Always, Mr. President. The locator, when he comes to get a patent and discovers that he is not a citizen, finds himself compelled to go over to the clerk's office and there to swear allegiance to the United States. I have seen men who had carried muskets in the American Army for four years compelled to do that. Were they any better men after they had taken the oath before that clerk than they were when they took it before the mustering officer? Were they any more entitled to the kindly care of this Government because of that oath than they were when they risked their lives in the defense of the integrity of their adopted land?

Our statute says "bona fide residents," and the Senator wants to incorporate in the statute the words "bona fide citizens." Mr. President, if there is any evil here at all, that evil can always be met by the United States attorney. It can always be met by a proceeding to compel such a man to take out his first papers, or to forfeit his claim by a proceeding in court. If he lets it go to a conclusion, this great Government does not steal his little all; it turns it over to him, and lets him have it. What the Senator's amendment will do would be to let the blackmailer and the jumper of claims contest it with the locator and ultimately become the owner of it. I am glad to say that every nation in the world that I know of has denied that right to the interloper and the invader.

Mr. President, if I speak with a little warmth on this subject, it is because I have seen the evil of it. I have seen a man with a claim as righteous as any man ever had in the world, and I have seen a blackmailer, getting behind him a capitalist, worry the owner until he has robbed him of the better part, and in some instances of all, of his claim because he could not keep up the fight with his richer and abler antagonist.

Mr. President, if there is a class of men who are contemned and despised in the mining camps it is the claim jumpers; and no man despises them more than I do. These men who are coming here with their attorney show themselves to be jumpers when they come here and ask us to give them a standing in court with a provision of law that shall unsettle a well-adjudicated line of decisions that a man in possession of a mining claim, no matter what the vice might be in the inception of his claim, is protected from an outsider filing a claim over him.

Mr. President, when you come to amend the mining laws, if you want to do so, put in something more stringent, but I insist there has never been any abuse of these laws and there is no reason for such legislation now. The assumption of the Senator from Montana that we are inviting all the world to come in is not correct, for we do not propose to do so. If he thinks we do, let him confine his legislation—which he has not done in this amendment, and which he does not propose to do—let him confine it to claims that shall be located hereafter. Then all the world will know upon what terms such claims are to be located. Do not let us change a rule of law which has become a rule of property since 1866.

Mr. President, the mining interests of this country are great interests. We have put out in this country in the last forty-eight years more than half of all the metal money that has been in circulation in the world; and we are to put out more. We have thousands of mining camps, and no mining camp has ever asked for any legislation of this kind upon this subject. Cripple Creek, which has put out its thirty or forty million dollars a year, has had nobody here demanding a change in the mining laws. The miners there have not found any danger of foreign interference. They have felt that they were running no risks of hordes of foreigners coming over here and dominating Americans; and they have not felt that they had any representative on this floor who was unmindful of their interests. The miners of the great State of Colorado do not need the fostering and kindly care of either the Senator from Montana or the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the hour is late, and I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. I trust the Senator will withdraw that motion, as I desire to move an executive session.

Mr. CARTER. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. CARTER submitted the following amendment; which was ordered to be printed:

Strike out sections 73 and 74 and insert:

"SEC. —. That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as changing the existing mining laws of the United States, but in any suit, action, or proceeding hereafter commenced involving the validity of an unpatented mining location on the public domain any party alleging an interest in the subject-matter may put the competency of the locator in issue, and the court shall determine whether the locator was a citizen or had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States at the time the location was made."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 19, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 18, 1900.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Frank W. Hackett, of New Hampshire, to be Assistant Secretary of the Navy, vice Charles H. Allen, resigned.

PROMOTION IN THE ARMY—ARTILLERY ARM.

First Lieut. Samuel D. Sturgis, Sixth Artillery, to be captain, April 8, 1900, vice Ostheim, First Artillery, deceased.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

Robert M. Wallace, of South Carolina, to be collector of customs in and for the district of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, in the place of John R. Tolbert, removed.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 18, 1900.

PROMOTIONS IN THE VOLUNTEER ARMY—FORTY-SIXTH INFANTRY.

First Lieut. Henry H. Sheen, Forty-sixth Infantry, to be captain, April 10, 1900.

Second Lieut. Richard B. Kavanagh, Forty-sixth Infantry, to be first lieutenant, April 10, 1900.

PROMOTION IN THE MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

P. A. Surg. George T. Vaughan, of Virginia, to be surgeon in the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 18, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE SHIPPING BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be given until Friday, April 27, to bring in the minority report on the shipping bill, the House having given that committee hitherto permission to report by the 20th of April. This meets the approval of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio who is at the head of the committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not understand the length of time asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Until Friday, April 27. I think that was the agreement.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is no objection to that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the minority of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries have until Friday, April 27, to file the minority views, the House having given heretofore until April 20. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAY OF THE NAVY.

Pay of officers on sea duty; officers on shore and other duty; officers on waiting orders; officers on the retired list; Admiral's secretary; clerks to commandants of yards and stations; clerks to paymasters at yards and stations; general storekeepers, receiving ships and other vessels; for 4 additional clerks, 1 to commandant, at $1,500 per year, and 1 to paymaster and general storekeeper, at $1,300 per year, at Honolulu, and 1 to commandant, at $1,500 per year, and 1 to paymaster and general storekeeper, at $1,300 per year, at Samoa; commutation of quarters for officers on shore not occupying public quarters; pay of enlisted men on the retired list; extra pay to men reenlisting under honorable discharge; interest on deposits by men; pay of petty officers, seamen, landsmen, and apprentice boys, including men in the engineers' force and for the Fish Commission, 17,500 men and 2,500 apprentices under training at training stations and on board training ships, and for men detailed for duty with naval militia at the pay prescribed by law, $12,810,897.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment on page 1, line 9, after the word "pay," to insert the amendment I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, on page 1, after the word "pay," insert: "and allowances prescribed by law."

Mr. FOSS. I may state, Mr. Chairman, that this simply makes the bill correspond to the current law in that regard.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

EMERGENCY FUND, NAVY DEPARTMENT.

To meet unforeseen contingencies for the maintenance of the Navy constantly arising, to be expended at the discretion of the President, $500,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order against this emergency-fund provision of the bill. I make the point of order that there is no law for it, that it is new legislation, and is obnoxious to the rule. I refer to the paragraph just read by the Clerk, which changes existing law.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I believe that this appropriation for an emergency fund to meet unforeseen contingencies for the maintenance of the Navy—a fund of $500,000—is in order under the rules of the House.

This appropriation is for the maintenance of the naval establishment in connection with our insular possessions. We have about one-half of our Navy stationed in the Philippines, as well as one-half of our Marine Corps; and there are a thousand and one contingencies which might arise in view of the uncertain conditions in those far-away possessions which would make the appropriation necessary.

The maintenance of the Navy, Mr. Chairman, has been held to be a work or object already in progress under the rule, and consequently it comes, in my judgment, under the provisions of Rule XXI and within the law.

Another thing. This emergency fund, while in the discretion of the President, is to be expended through the different bureaus of the Navy Department, which have been already authorized by law. For these two reasons I hold that the point of order is not well taken, and should be overruled.

Mr. KITCHIN. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to say that, as far as the maintenance of the Navy is concerned, throughout this bill will be found items for the protection and maintenance of the Navy, but that this is an entirely new section. It is called "Emergency fund, Navy Department." There is absolutely no law and no precedent for it, as I understand. The language is this:

EMERGENCY FUND, NAVY DEPARTMENT.

To meet unforeseen contingencies for the maintenance of the Navy constantly arising, to be expended at the discretion of the President, $500,000.

Now, in the first place, I think to make it at the disposal of the President makes it new legislation certainly, but the entire fund itself is new legislation. Nowhere in our law can you find any such fund, known as the emergency fund, to be placed at the disposal of the President.

The gentleman says we have islands in the Orient and we know not what may happen there, and therefore this is a necessity. The point I made was not whether it was a necessity or not, but whether it changed existing law, and the gentleman has pointed to no precedent to sustain this item. With all due respect to the opinion of the acting chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I press my point of order that this is new legislation.

If this is not new legislation, pray tell me what items might you not add to this bill. Why not add an item of a million dollars to be used by the Secretary of the Navy for some general emergency, to be at his disposal? Why not give a constructor of some navy-yard a million dollars to be at his disposal, because we know not what may happen? The whole structure there might be burned. But I believe that this Congress ought to exercise its own judgment in appropriating money, and until Congress has enacted the law under which this emergency fund can be properly appropriated, it is clear to my mind that it is new legislation and is subject to the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say a word upon the point of order. The propriety of making this appropriation is one thing. The right to make it under the rules is another thing. Now, this is a fund in the nature of a miscellaneous or contingent fund, and the same rule that makes it in order at various places in this bill to appropriate a contingent fund for miscellaneous purposes makes it in order to appropriate, so far as the rules are concerned, $500,000—

To meet unforeseen contingencies for the maintenance of the Navy constantly arising, to be expended at the discretion of the President.

It seems to me the bare statement of the proposition and of what runs all through every general appropriation bill in making miscellaneous or contingent appropriations would cover sufficiently the objection to the point of order.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. One moment. Why, Mr. Chairman, it would be in order to appropriate under our rules in the following language: "That there be, and hereby is, appropriated for every purpose in connection with the Navy, to support the same in pursuance of law and for contingent expenses and unforeseen expenses, to be expended in the discretion of the President for these purposes, $61,000,000." That would be entirely in order under the rules. As to whether it would be wise to make such an appropriation or not is another question.

Mr. BERRY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. What are the possibilities; what character of expenditures might this cover?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I do not know; but I will ask my friend, what are the possibilities and what is the character of expenditures to be covered by an appropriation for contingent expenses? It is anything in the——

Mr. BERRY. There might in the secret service be something of that kind.

Mr. CANNON. It is for anything that pertains to the public service, the Navy being authorized by law. Now, any appropriation in connection with the public service, for the purpose for which the Navy is authorized and organized under law, for its support, seems to me is in order under the rule.

Mr. BERRY. I understand that proposition; but now each section of this bill takes up equipment, or navy-yards, and so on, and says what shall be expended, and I just wanted an idea from the gentleman or from the chairman of the committee what were the possible expenditures of a contingent character.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I am not discussing that question.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is the gentleman aware——

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from North Carolina may be correct in his contention as to whether this is the best way to appropriate. I am inclined to think he is not correct in that contention; but I am only addressing myself to the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he was aware that this bill has contingent funds, according to the law and the precedents, for the different bureaus of the Navy Department also amounting to $467,000?

Mr. CANNON. I certainly am aware; but the same point of order that would be fatal, or effective, rather, to this proposition would be effective to the appropriation of the $400,000 that the gentleman refers to, in my opinion.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. RIXEY. Suppose there is no emergency fund, and there should be a deficiency; does not your Committee on Appropriations provide for cases of that kind?

Mr. CANNON. Ah! But my friend will allow me; deficiencies in the absence of appropriations can not be made except where the law authorizes them. In other words, in the ordinary business of the Government the officer of the Government is powerless unless there is an appropriation or unless the law should authorize it, which it does in very rare instances, in order to make an obligation against the Government where there is no appropriation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Illinois has overlooked the history that brought about the adoption of this very rule. Until 1838 there was no rule against adopting new legislation on appropriation bills, but up to that time a great many appropriation bills had failed to become law by reason of the fights that grew out of the attempt to adopt new legislation or change existing law; and Mr. Hinds, in his Digest of Parliamentary Precedents, states on page 280 that—

> In 1835 the fortification appropriation bill had failed because the Senate would not agree to an item of $3,000,000 to be disbursed by the President for certain extraordinary military and naval purposes.

Now, here is an item identically the same carried in this bill, to be disbursed by the President for "extraordinary military and naval purposes."

Mr. DAYTON. I hope the gentleman will pardon me; I did not hear the page.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Page 280 of Hinds's Digest. The failure of that bill for that reason, Mr. Speaker, caused the adoption of this rule to avoid these contingencies in the future, and the very adoption of the rule grew out of a similar provision in a general appropriation bill to this one now before the House. It was for the purpose explicitly, as stated in Hinds's Digest, of avoiding such a contingency that this rule was adopted. I am reading from Hinds's Parliamentary Precedents of the House of Representatives. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word on this matter in connection with the point of order. I want to call attention to the fact that in the Fifty-third Congress, third session, page 2403, in an opinion the Chairman rendered on the naval appropriation bill, on which a point of order was raised against an addition made to the naval force——

The CHAIRMAN. What page is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not hear the gentleman from West Virginia and ask for order.

The CHAIRMAN. What page is the gentleman from West Virginia reading from?

Mr. DAYTON. I am referring to page 2406 of the RECORD, and not of Hinds's Digest. I will send it to the Chair in one moment. It was held that there was a difference to be observed in reference to the work of a Department, such as the Navy Department; that it was a continuing work, and that although the expenditure might be increased, nevertheless these sums of money can be appropriated for it, even to the extent of adding new ships; even to the extent of increasing the amount of the force, because it was "a work already in progress."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Pardon me; when I discuss a legal point, I do not want to be interrupted right in the midst of the statement. I will yield to you in a moment. It is not an appropriation to any new Department; it is not an appropriation to any new work of any kind or character; it is simply an additional appropriation to a Department well organized. It does not change existing law. It is simply an additional appropriation to work already in progress, to be used in case of an emergency and to be accounted for if used.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Now let me make the point. First, the Navy is established in a work "already in progress." Second, this appropriation does not change existing law or provide for any new object, but simply gives more money to the establishment or work, to be used in case of an emergency. Third, it is to be expended in a legal and proper manner. Now I will listen to you.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman if, in his argument, he is contending that all matters of the Navy, such as the building of ships, or dockyards, or of armor-plate factories, are continuing work? Is not that the argument that the gentleman makes?

Mr. DAYTON. Do you mean that as an argument for the armor-plate factory?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it could be used as such when we come to it.

Mr. DAYTON. When we reach that bridge, my friend, I will answer that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman does not stand by his argument.

Mr. DAYTON. An armor-plate factory has no more to do naturally with the Navy than the man in the moon.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Quite as much as a steam engine.

Mr. DAYTON. Not any more than the digging of coal in West Virginia is a part of the naval establishment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, in reference to this argument, I want to say we know——

Mr. DAYTON. I want to send this record up to the Chair, as I promised.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (continuing). When the question was first raised in this House as to whether a ship was a continuing improvement of the Navy, it was in reference to the New York. The ship New York had been commenced in 1869, and in 1885 was still uncompleted. A proposition was made to appropriate to finish the building of the ship New York.

The Chair ruled that that was an appropriation to carry out an undertaking that had already been begun by law, and that was the beginning of the precedent established in this matter. The next Congress adopted it for new vessels that had not been begun. But, Mr. Chairman, although these precedents are well established, and particularly in this House, they are with reference to the building of ships or the completion and carrying out of a specific purpose that is known to be a part of the Navy.

This appropriation, now before the Chair for consideration, does not make the appropriation for any specific object, but it leaves it indefinite for the President to spend for any purposes within the naval affairs of the United States. Now, I will call the Chair's attention to this ruling, on page 288 of the Digest:

> By public works and objects already in progress are meant tangible matters, like buildings, roads, etc., and not duties in an executive department.

That decision is found in the records of the Fifty-first Congress. I do not know who the Chairman was who decided the proposition, but it is clearly within the line of all decisions in such matters. It is absolutely in contravention of the argument of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON]. It clearly holds that this object must be like buildings, public roads—some definite known object that is tangible and can be reached.

Furthermore, it says it must not be executive, whereas this provision is absolutely executive; it puts the money in the hands of the Executive to be used as he pleases, and not for any specific or tangible purpose.

Mr. DAYTON. The reason I referred to the decision in the Fifty-third Congress is because of the distinction that is drawn between the class of works to which the gentleman from Alabama refers and the naval establishment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say that it is not a tangible object; there is no specific object mentioned; it is purely an appropriation to be expended by the Executive, and that was held could not be done by this decision of the Fifty-first Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, the point of order, I take it, is predicated on clause 2 of Rule XXI, which reads as follows:

2. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

Now, if this provision of the rule is in force and is to have application on this question, it seems to me that no doubt can arise; it seems to me that there is no room for doubt that the point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is good and ought to be sustained. The item to which he raises this point is:

To meet unforeseen contingencies for the maintenance of the Navy constantly arising, to be expended at the discretion of the President, $500,000.

There is no limitation whatever as to the Presidential expenditure or the exercise of the President's discretion. Anything the President may regard as a contingency, an unforeseen one, is the thing that he can provide for under this item of appropriation. There is no law that authorizes this. If the President were to conclude that under this item in the bill a new ship ought to be built, he would be authorized by this item to build it. And yet it is the general course of legislation, the universal course in Congress, to provide for the building of each and every ship that is built. If the President were to conclude that it would be a good scheme to buy a ship, there would be authority given in this item to buy it; and yet it has been the course of legislation that authority must be given to the Department, the President, or somebody to make such purchase or it can not be made. If it were to occur to the President, with this item in the bill, that a new navy-yard ought to be established or a new dock constructed, authority would be found here for it. If it were called an unforeseen contingency, he could make the investment and incur the indebtedness.

If it were concluded that it would be a good scheme to buy a new island, or a group of islands, "for the maintenance of the Navy," for the establishment of navy-yards, the language of the appropriation is broad enough to allow it; and yet there is no law in existence authorizing any such investment by the President or any such disposition of money by him or anybody else. There is a tendency of late in legislation that certainly ought to be checked by a proper ruling on these items, when objected to, to enlarge the discretionary power of this and that officer of the Government, transferring to him in bulk, and large bulk, the public funds to be disposed of as he may think necessary, under such circumstances as he thinks would warrant the investment.

Now, the older and better system was, and we ought to return to it, to provide by legislation what is to be done, to direct the expenditures that are to be made, not merely to turn over to some executive officer funds in bulk to do as he thinks fit with the money that ought to be handled by Congress, in the exercise of its own judgment. This is only one of the many like items found in this bill and other appropriation bills of recent origin.

If it is necessary to provide by law for such expenditures, then provide by law, in the lawful way, by introducing and passing a bill and letting it become a law. Then when the law has been made, if Congress deems it proper to appropriate under the law, let Congress so appropriate; but do not make law in violation of your rules, in violation of propriety, and in great danger to economical and just and honest administration of the Government; and at the same time that you are making such a law do not unloose the purse strings and turn over the treasure of the people to any executive officer.

To my mind it is hard to see how there can be new legislation if this is not new legislation. No such power exists to-day; no such expenditures can be made, if the Treasury were filled to overflowing, by any President or other executive officer of the Government. I should like some one to point out what particular thing connected with the maintenance of a navy and regarded as an "unforeseen contingency," subject to the judgment only of one man, can be specified that will fall outside of the ample breastworks here reared.

Mr. FOSS. I will state to the gentleman that we have to-day in Manila sixty or seventy vessels of the Navy. We have about half the Marine Corps there. In view of the unsettled conditions, and in view of our ignorance as to those conditions, there are liable to arise constantly contingencies which may make necessary an appropriation like this.

Mr. DE ARMOND. That does not meet the question here. The question here is as to the power to make this appropriation in this bill—whether any law exists under which you can make it—any law which authorizes it. That is the question here.

Mr. FOSS. I understood the gentleman to ask me what this appropriation was for—the necessity for it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I ask this—and I direct the inquiry to the gentleman who is the acting chairman of the committee or to any other gentleman—whether he can specify any particular thing which the President might not regard as an unforeseen contingency, anything connected with the maintenance of the Navy, on account of which the President might not expend all this $500,000, or any part of it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] I will direct the attention of my friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] to page 15 of the bill, where there is an appropriation of $6,000,000 to cover the very things which this appropriation purports to cover.

Mr. FOSS. I did not understand the question of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The point I made was this: That this legislation is so thoroughly new, so sweeping, that you can not circumscribe or limit it if this provision be passed. I think you can not specify a single thing connected with the Navy so thoroughly unauthorized now that the President may not do that thing with all this money or any part of it.

If there is any such thing connected with the Navy which can be specified as a thing that can not be done with this money or part of this money, I should be glad to have it specified. You can buy ships; you can build ships; you can buy navy-yards; you can construct navy-yards; you can buy docks; you can hire docks; you can hire ships; you can hire men—either permanently or temporarily. You can do anything that may be regarded as tending toward "the maintenance of the Navy" and arising out of an "unforeseen contingency."

Passing from that consideration, the point I make is that no law exists authorizing such a sweeping use of the public money, such a blind use of the public money, such a use of the public money for things not provided for and not thought of—things to be thought of and to be provided for, simply according to the judgment or the will of the President.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] suggests that this appropriation is necessary because there is ignorance as to what legislation we should have or what we may need in Manila or elsewhere. That has nothing to do with the point of order. If it is necessary (which I do not concede) that there should be such legislation as this, then under the rules, and under correct methods of parliamentary procedure, that legislation ought to be secured by the introduction and passage of a bill. Such a bill being passed and authorizing such an expenditure as this, then it would be entirely competent to make appropriations for this expenditure. But here comes an appropriation without the authority to make it. Here comes an appropriation without any law authorizing it. Here comes an enactment of a law which authorizes an appropriation in the very words which enact the law itself.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield for a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly.

Mr. FOSS. Does not the gentleman think that the maintenance of the naval establishment and for incidental expenses in connection with the naval establishment, as expressed in the pending bill and the paragraph to which exception is quoted, is a "work and object already in progress?"

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman were to insist upon the doctrine that he holds—that is, that a large surplus fund might be appropriated in this way without a specific object—it would be, in the same line of reasoning, perfectly competent to throw away the entire bill; to include the entire appropriation for the naval establishment on one page, the size of one of the pages presented here, and authorize the President of the United States to expend that in his discretion. Is the gentleman prepared to assume a position of that kind? I ask if that is competent under the law; and whether, if the law be enforced, such an appropriation as that provided in the pending bill, and against which the point of order is made, is possible under our rule?

Mr. Chairman, if the law is in force which would authorize this provision of the bill, then the same law must be in force on every other item of this bill and in any other appropriation bill passed and to be passed by this House, and instead of legislating for a thousand dollars on this, or ten thousand on that, or a million dollars on the other proposition contained in the various bills, it would only be necessary—because in that event it would be competent for Congress—it would only be necessary to have a simple bill, containing but one item, making a bulk appropriation of the whole amount carried by the bill, and placing the entire lump sum at the disposal of the President, to do as he may see fit, to exercise his own discretion in the expenditure of the money.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend from Missouri yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I for myself assent to the proposition the gentleman makes, that a bill might be drawn in one sentence not longer than my finger; and it is quite competent under the rules of the House to appropriate $61,000,000 for the naval establishment instead of in detail for the support of the Navy, under the law, of course.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes; I agree with the gentleman, "under the law." But there is no provision of law that authorizes the expenditure of this sum or any other sum for incidental contingencies or necessary contingencies that might arise.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. To be expended in the discretion of the executive officer of the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Ah, but for the maintenance of the Navy.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Where is the provision of law that authorizes such an appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. It arises from the power authorized by existing law to have a Navy at all and the provision of law that requires or authorizes the maintenance of that Navy. There can be no question on that point.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will the gentleman cite the law to which he refers?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But not a law to be executed in the discretion of the executive officers of the Government. The law is specific.

Mr. CANNON. Of course I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi to the extent that the President could not organize an army or a navy under that discretion.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. But, according to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, he could organize a navy and use the discretionary fund placed at his disposal for that purpose.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The law is specific and provides for the doing of certain things. This appropriation gives to the Executive a discretion that is not provided by law in any sense.

Mr. CANNON. But he must maintain a navy?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I ask the gentleman from Illinois if the President, under this discretion, could add five thousand or one thousand men to the naval force authorized by law?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly not.

Mr. DE ARMOND. And why?

Mr. CANNON. Because the law itself fixes the number.

Mr. DE ARMOND. But you are making a new law in this provision.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; I do not so understand it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The gentleman from Illinois is entirely familiar with the matter of appropriations in this House, and knows as well as any of us, and can state better than any of us, the fundamental propositions that are embodied in the law, that we can not appropriate a cent of the money of the people from the Treasury of the Government without a law which authorizes it. Now, if there is a law which authorizes this appropriation, it can be found. I ask the gentleman where that law is to be found?

Mr. CANNON. The law is the law creating the Navy; that there shall be so many officers, so many enlisted men, so many ships, and that there shall be coaling stations here and there, and all of the details that go to make up the complement of the Navy; and all the bills, as a matter of detail providing for the service of the Government, are based on the same principle. If it be necessary to utilize this appropriation, which the bill provides, and the President finds in his discretion, under the advice of the naval establishment, that another coaling station is necessary, he could purchase it, he could provide for it, because it is necessary for the "maintenance of the Navy" and is a part of the naval establishment. If any one of the thousand things that constantly arise in connection with the Navy should present itself, he is in a position to use a portion of this fund of $500,000 for the "maintenance of the Navy" under the law.

Of course it would have to be "under the law," because otherwise he could not expend it. But the law is clear on these points, and there can be no doubt as to the fact that the President must expend such appropriation "under the law" and not otherwise. And when I say an expenditure "for the maintenance of the Navy," the law itself necessarily specifies what that means and where the expenditure may properly go. Of course it nowhere specifies how any pound of powder should be used. It nowhere specifies a thousand other things that are necessary for the maintenance of the Navy. The matter is placed in the discretion of the Executive. The President could use the fund, if necessary, for the purchase of powder or for any other purpose in connection with the maintenance of the Navy where sound discretion is lodged with him. In other words, it is a wise precaution that provides an emergency fund to anticipate any unusual demand that may be made upon the resources of the Navy under the discretion of the President. We must trust him to some extent. Gentlemen will not deny that; and we must provide to meet unforeseen contingencies in the naval establishment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I am assuming to talk in the time of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly, I yield to the gentleman to allow a question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Illinois will no doubt recollect the fact that there was a point of order made upon a provision in the appropriation bill from his committee in the Fifty-first Congress, where it was held that an appropriation to come within the law must provide for a tangible object "already in progress," such as the building of a new custom-house, or any other expenditure of the same character, and not for an intangible thing, like that suggested in the present bill. That decision was made in the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. CANNON. I can see how that would be a very apt decision under certain conditions to arrive at certain things. I do not recollect the decision that the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have referred the Chairman to it.

Mr. CANNON. But I will say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] that the authority for this appropriation is to be found in the authority for every contingent and miscellaneous expenditure that is appropriated for.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois this question: Where is to be found the authority under existing law for authorizing the President to expend this $500,000 or any of it?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the whole of it authorizes the Executive, and it is quite as competent now that we make these appropriations directly authorizing their expenditure by the Executive as it is to authorize their expenditure by the various Departments. The greater includes the less. The President is at the head of the whole shooting match. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says this expenditure can be made for the maintenance of the Navy. I do not concede that; but, passing that, by whom can it be made? Where is the law that authorizes it to be made by anybody? You have to designate the person who is to make it.

Mr. CANNON. This appropriation, like scores of other appropriations proposed in this bill and that have been in all naval appropriation bills, is for expenditures necessary to the maintenance of the naval establishment. Now, the naval establishment, I will say again, is under law as to its personnel.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Suppose this were an appropriation authorizing the expenditure of this $500,000 by the Secretary of the Navy. Would that be a change of existing law?

Mr. CANNON. I think not.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Then there is no existing law directing who shall make the expenditure. Is that true?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I say the greater includes the less.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes; but is that true, if the gentleman from Illinois please? Is it true that there is nothing in the law determining who shall make an expenditure for "unforeseen contingencies?"

Mr. CANNON. I have no recollection of there being a specific law that it shall be competent for Congress to appropriate so much money, saying that A B or C D shall alone make that expenditure. There may be such a law, but I now have no recollection of any. But I do have a recollection that all rules and all laws have, if I may be allowed the expression, their common law, and any appropriation to carry out a law or maintain an establishment under law for contingent expenses, for miscellaneous expenses, for unforeseen contingencies, in the discretion of the President, is in order. It might be a question as to the wisdom of making such an appropriation, but anything that maintains that establishment which is organized under law and makes it efficient, it seems to me, I will say to the gentleman, is authorized by law.

Mr. DE ARMOND. There are two things in it. In the first place, there must be a law authorizing the appropriation. That is clear under clause 2 of Rule XXI. There must be a law authorizing the appropriation. Now, that law must authorize all that is done in and by the appropriation, or you make new legislation about it. In the first place, there is no law authorizing the appropriation for "unforeseen contingencies" for the maintenance of the Navy. The gentleman from Illinois can not find it. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS], can not find it. Nobody can find it, because it does not exist. Hence, there is not a scrap of law that authorizes the President to dispose of any money appropriated for the maintenance of the Navy covered by this particular item; and the President can not appropriate it, and the President can not handle it unless he is authorized by law to do it.

Neither can the Secretary of the Navy nor any other official, great or small, in the Government do the same thing. So, then, this item at once makes the law and makes the appropriation under the law, makes both at one and the same time, and that is violative of paragraph 2 of Rule XXI. If we are going to adhere to the rules, however great the necessity which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] talks about, it is necessary first to have the law, and then to make the appropriation to carry it out.

If we are going to disregard the rules, it is another proposition.

The discussion so far has proceeded upon the theory that we will try to observe them.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. I desire to state that in each bureau there have been for a great many years and is to-day a contingent fund. Now, this emergency fund, if the Chair will look at the bill, applies not to any one bureau, but to all bureaus; in other words, for the whole Navy Department, and for the maintenance of the Navy. It is a contingency provision, not for one department—it has been recognized for years and years as in order—but for all departments.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. FOSS. Certainly.

Mr. DE ARMOND. You say a provision has been made to set apart a contingency fund for each and all of the various bureaus of the Department?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. And this is an additional provision for all the departments. Now, then, I ask you if it is not a change of existing law to make it apply in bulk to every branch of the departments? When you make an appropriation for all in a lump and put it in the hands of a Government officer, who, under the existing laws, can not handle any of this fund, do you not make a new law, and are you not appropriating without law until you make it?

Mr. FOSS. I think it is substantially the same.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to another fact, and that is, that emergency funds are not unusual. In the last deficiency act, of March 3, 1899, there was a fund of this character of $500,000 appropriated by Congress.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is impossible to hear.

Mr. FOSS. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that emergency funds are not unusual in appropriation bills and that in the deficiency act of last year, approved March 3, 1899, there was an appropriation of $500,000 for emergencies in connection with the naval establishment, practically the same provision which is here in this bill, and that I understand the additional deficiency act of this year, which was reported by the Committee on Appropriations, has an emergency provision.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois this question: Suppose the words were to be left out "to be expended at the discretion of the President," and the rest of the language were left in, making the appropriation, in whose discretion would the money be expended?

Mr. FOSS. I think the money would be expended by the Navy Department, under the direction of the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question upon what he has just said. The gentleman has cited two instances in which he thinks the same proposition was involved as in this case. The gentleman will remember that those were items for a specific department, and this point of order was not raised against either of those appropriations; and the point being not raised, certainly they can not be considered precedents.

Mr. FOSS. I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

This bill is a bill making appropriation for the naval service for the next fiscal year. Of course, every appropriation in the bill is for the maintenance of the naval establishment. This appropriation is for "the maintenance of the Navy;" broadly speaking, that is what the object of the appropriation is. It is so stated in the appropriating words; "to meet unforeseen contingencies for the Navy constantly arising," in the mind of the Chair, is simply a limitation on that appropriation. So that the Chair has no difficulty whatever on the first proposition. The appropriation is for the maintenance of the Navy, and is in order on this bill. The question is whether the language "to be expended at the discretion of the President" changes existing law.

The Chair finds a ruling made in the Fifty-fourth Congress on an appropriation—

> For the relief and care of the poor and destitute, and for such charitable and reformatory work and such care and medical and surgical treatment of poor and destitute patients in the District of Columbia as have been heretofore usually provided for by direct appropriations to private institutions and as the District Commissioners may deem necessary the sum of $94,700 to be expended under the direction of said Commissioners, either under contract with responsible and competent persons or institutions, or by employing for the purpose the public institutions or agencies of said District where practicable, etc.

The point of order was made against that amendment, and the Speaker of the House held—that being in the House—the point of order was not well taken, and that that amendment was in order. While the present occupant of the chair would hardly go so far as to hold that that particular amendment was in order, as at present advised, yet the question rises here whether it is any more than a limitation on this appropriation, to be used in the discretion of the President—when the President approves of it, in other words. That is the view the Chair takes of it, and so overrules the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. From that ruling, Mr. Chairman, I appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as a judgment of the committee?

The question was put.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. DAYTON. A parliamentary inquiry. What is the motion before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Whether the decision of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the committee?

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 83.

Mr. FOSS. I demand tellers.

The question was taken on ordering tellers, and tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. KITCHIN, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. FOSS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 94, nays 89.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky will state it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I paired generally with my colleague on the committee, Mr. METCALF of California, and I desire to ask the Chair—I know it is entirely within the discretion of the members of the House—what the practice has been in voting; whether or not pairs are respected in Committee of the Whole on matters like the one under consideration. I refrained from voting, but there seems to be some conflict in the minds of different members, and I would like to ask the Chair what the practice has been.

The CHAIRMAN. The question rests entirely with each member as to pairs. The Chair can not state what the practice of the members of the House may be, but as far as the Chair is individually concerned, when paired he refrains from voting on all questions.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am paired on this question with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I voted in the affirmative, and I wish to withdraw my vote.

Mr. GAINES. I voted in the negative, and I desire to withdraw my vote. Is there no rule of the House, Mr. Chairman, that controls this question of pairs?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no rule except that the pairs shall be in writing and may be announced at the end of a vote. The Chair will state that it is not clear that a vote can be withdrawn after the result is announced. However, in this case, it does not affect the result, as one has been withdrawn in the affirmative and one in the negative.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend this paragraph by striking out lines 12, 13, and 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> On page 4 strike out lines 12, 13, and 14, in the following words:
> "To meet unforeseen contingencies for the maintenance of the Navy constantly arising, to be expended at the discretion of the President, $500,000."

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is well-nigh useless now to say anything to the House on this item, as some friction has been generated by the discussion of the point of order. I suppose all of us give way to our natural inclinations to follow the lead of our respective parties, but I desire to submit a few observations to the committee and then will acquiesce cheerfully in whatever its judgment may dictate.

If there is any evidence—and I wish the chairman of the committee would give me his attention—if there is any evidence before the Committee on Naval Affairs asking for this appropriation, I have been unable to discover it. The President of the United States certainly never asked for it.

I am aware that the Secretary of the Navy, after the item had been incorporated in the bill and after the committee had discussed the matter pro and con, did, in response to an inquiry propounded to him by the chairman, say that he believed that this item should be left in the bill. But in response to a further question, asked by myself, he declared that in his judgment the practice of making appropriations of great sums of money to be expended at the discretion of any Department officer was vicious and unwise.

Now, I care nothing about this particular item, Mr. Chairman; it is a small matter when we come to consider the vast revenues of the Treasury. I am a sincere advocate of building and maintaining a great Navy by the Federal Government. I believe the spirit of our people sanctions such a purpose. I am confident we are heartily supported in our efforts to construct a Navy that will render our shores secure from the attack of any country under the sun.

I believe in the establishment of a great Navy not as an engine of offense, but as a means of defense. And, desiring to see a great Navy constructed and maintained, I do not like to see items like the present creeping into appropriation bills which, to put it mildly, will excite suspicion in the conservative element of our country.

I am not willing to trust the President of the United States to handle $500,000 of the people's money when he makes no explanation to me or my constituents as to what he does with it. I say that in a kindly spirit. If I should lie down and die this afternoon, I would be unwilling to let my affairs be administered by any man without giving bonds to report to my heirs or assigns.

Here is an appropriation bill carrying sixty-one millions of money. Every department of the Navy has a contingent appropriation, in the aggregate, of $470,000. And yet, so far as I am advised, upon the ipse dixit of the chairman of this committee, the sum of $500,000 is incorporated in this bill. If it is necessary, it certainly has not been pressed by the Department of the Navy.

What put it there? It was put there simply because the last appropriation bill carried a similar item; and this tends to accentuate the dangerous tendency to make extravagant appropriations in the American Congress. It is unprecedented. The last appropriation bill, passed when we were just recovering from our struggle with Spain, carried an item like this. No protest was raised against it; no point of order was suggested. Now, we find cropping out in this bill a similar item. Next year it will have been sanctioned by two appropriation bills, and it will become a regular appropriation for the Navy Department. Why? It is an open secret that many of the appropriations——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I ask five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. It is an open secret that many of the appropriations in all our Departments are too high. That is an infirmity of our system from which we can not escape. I do not think that it is to be charged to any particular party or to any particular committee. Necessarily we make appropriations sometimes (relying upon the heads of Departments) which are greater than they should be. I have been told within the last two days that under a certain Department of the Government, just before the expiration of the last fiscal year, a particular public work was in progress. The officer who was talking to me said he went to that public work and saw dozens and dozens of men engaged there in all sorts of work, and was told that an effort was being made to use up the appropriation which had been made, because it was so great they wanted the whole thing wiped out before the next bill was considered.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Do you claim that this discretion has been abused in any way?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. What discretion?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The discretion conferred on the Secretary of the Navy in the last bill, which the gentleman has just referred to.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. No, sir; I do not. I make no reflection upon anybody. I think that in all probability the last appropriation was absolutely necessary.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Then, why not trust them now?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. If the President will say that he wants this appropriation, I will vote for it cheerfully; I shall be glad to do so. If the gentleman will point me to any responsible head of a Department who says this appropriation is necessary, I will cheerfully support it.

Mr. DAYTON. If it is recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, is that sufficient for the gentleman?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The Secretary of the Navy is not the responsible head when it comes to a question of this sort; and I am unwilling to accept his judgment.

Mr. DAYTON. Then I understand you draw a distinction between the President and the Secretary of the Navy in this matter.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I do. If the Secretary of the Navy had originally asked for this, I should have raised no question against it; but I say that the Secretary of the Navy made no such request. The appropriation was put in the bill, so far as I am advised, upon the suggestion of the chairman of the committee or some of his colleagues.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Can the gentleman see no wisdom in the provision?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I see no wisdom in it, but, on the contrary, I see a vicious and dangerous principle involved; and therefore I oppose it. The gentleman from Michigan would be unwilling to put a provision of this kind in his own will, and you have no more right to handle recklessly the money of the American people than you have to do a similar thing in the transaction of your own private affairs.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I will state to the gentleman that this thing has been done again and again in private and public trust, and the power has not been abused, to my knowledge, and it is quite necessary that the Navy Department should have an emergency fund at its disposal in the present crisis of our country's affairs.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I am aware that this sort of an appropriation has sometimes been made, but rarely. But whether that is true or not, coming back to the question, we who honestly desire to build up and maintain a navy know that items of this character will excite the suspicion of the American people. No man knows what will become of this money. To the suggestion of the acting chairman of the committee [Mr. Foss] that there are some ships in the Philippines that might need some money, I reply that $8,500,000 are appropriated in this bill to cover just such contingencies as those suggested by the gentleman.

The appropriations for the Bureau of Equipment and the Bureau of Construction and Repair carry $8,500,000. If any ship goes on a reef, if any ship needs repairing, needs any work done upon it, there is the appropriation of $8,500,000 at the disposal of the Navy Department. If it should be necessary to buy coal to be used at any coaling station, there is an appropriation of $700,000 carried in this bill to cover just such contingencies. There is absolutely no demand for an appropriation of this kind.

Mr. DINSMORE. The gentleman said a few moments ago, I believe, that an appropriation similar to this was in the bill of last year.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINSMORE. Was such an appropriation in the bill prior to that time?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Never, so far as I am aware, in any naval bill.

Mr. DINSMORE. Was it not inserted in the last appropriation bill on account of the war then existing and because it was believed to be necessary?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. That appropriation last year was made in response to the same public sentiment that induced this House to put $50,000,000 in the hands of the Executive to provide for the defense of this country.

Mr. DINSMORE. Exactly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. We wanted to give the President everything that he needed; and if the Executive thinks this appropriation necessary, I venture to say there will not be a dissenting vote upon the question on this side of the Chamber. We protest against this appropriation because we believe it to be unnecessary and extravagant.

Mr. KITCHIN. Allow me to state to the gentleman from Kentucky that last year the amount referred to did appear as an appropriation in the original bill that we were considering; but after a thorough investigation of the last bill—the bill as passed—I find no such appropriation.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. But it went into the deficiency bill after the other bill had been passed.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me another question? He says that he would vote for this if the President asked it——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Yes; I will vote for it if the President says he wants it and if it is necessary; and I suppose that every member of the House would do so.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, as everyone knows, there is submitted to Congress at the beginning of every session a Book of Estimates; and in case there are supplementary estimates to be asked for, there is a report or a letter usually submitted from the appropriate Department with reference to any new provision which may be desired. Now, in the additional estimates submitted to Congress, that will be found in House Document 398; the Secretary of the Navy asks for an emergency fund of $500,000.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Illinois state the date of that communication?

Mr. DAYTON. That was the 2d day of February, 1900.

Mr. FOSS. February 2, 1900, as this record shows.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Is it not a fact that the bill, to which the gentleman is now referring in his remarks, contained the very item provided here before the date of that communication?

Mr. FOSS. No; it never did.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Why, the gentleman understands it was in the original appropriation bill?

Mr. DAYTON. Never.

Mr. FOSS. It was not in the bill before that date. It was asked for. The Secretary of the Navy said in his report:

It is requested that the item of $500,000 be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, to meet such expenses in connection with the Navy, etc., as might arise from time to time for which no specific appropriation is made, and for which the appropriation is unable to be estimated for, even approximately, at the present time.

That is the substance of what the Secretary recommends in this regard.

Now, I wish to quote the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy on this very proposition. This is the point to which I desire to call the attention of the members of this committee. I asked the question myself in reference to the items now under consideration. I wanted to ask the Secretary of the Navy a question in reference to the appropriation of the emergency fund to meet unforeseen contingencies constantly arising, to be expended at the discretion of the President:

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask the Secretary one more question, which is in reference to the necessity of the emergency fund for these unforeseen contingencies constantly arising, to be expended at the discretion of the President, $500,000. I understand that during the past year you had an emergency fund of $500,000 put on, I think, in the sundry civil bill?

Secretary LONG. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And this year you are asking for another fund for the same amount in order to meet the unsettled conditions in the foreign stations?

Secretary LONG. That is true.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Do I understand that means he is practically asking for $1,000,000?

The CHAIRMAN. No; just $500,000.

Secretary LONG. The same for next year as for the past.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. If we go into that I want to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to have the Secretary make a little fuller statement, if he can, as to the unforeseen contingencies and the necessity for that, in case we should be asked for a little fuller explanation on the floor.

Secretary LONG. The very words, "unforeseen contingencies," show the difficulty of stating what they are; but you can understand that, with the Philippine Islands on our hands and with three-fourths of our fleet there and half of our marines, things are liable to arise that you can not foresee. The best report that I could make about that would be to give you, which you already have, I presume, a statement of what we have expended.

Admiral CROWNINSHIELD. There is the transportation of enlisted men across the continent.

Secretary LONG. More than half of our marine force is over there and more than half of our vessels are there.

Admiral DEWEY. I suppose every cent that we spent at Cavite came out of that?

Secretary LONG. Yes.

Admiral DEWEY. We employed native labor and we had from 800 to 1,000 natives employed at our dockyards at Cavite repairing, unloading colliers, etc., and I wondered how we were going to pay for it when we were spending it.

Secretary LONG. Congress took care of you.

The CHAIRMAN. There are a thousand and one things that come up for which there is no specific appropriation in the bill for which you have to use some fund of this kind?

Secretary LONG. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Now, on that point what you have said relates to the condition of affairs which came up last year, because that was not foreseen and was an unforeseen contingency; but now that contingency has culminated, and each bureau has been provided with a contingent fund. Not in your capacity as Secretary of the Navy, but in your capacity as a citizen of the United States, do you not think that it is a very unwise policy for the legislative body of the Government to place a half million dollars of money at the disposal of any department, specific appropriations having been made for every bureau in that department?

Secretary LONG. The principle is accepted and recognized even in matters here at home. For instance, you give me a contingent fund of $5,000 in the Department. You have various contingent funds of that kind where you recognize the fact that there may be a contingency arise which is unforeseen. This will be still more the case in the unsettled conditions of the Philippines than here at home. I think we require some amount. It is simply for you to say how much you think is reasonable. I do not think a half million dollars is unreasonable under the circumstances, and that I should say as a citizen. I think it is perfectly proper to put half a million dollars at the disposal of the Department. You do much more than that for the Army, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSS. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Now, will the gentleman from Illinois state the reply of the Secretary of the Navy to my inquiry wherein he said that the practice was vicious—the practice of making these indefinite, contingent appropriations.

Mr. FOSS. I will allow the gentleman to make that statement or read the testimony for himself. But I do not think the Secretary used the word "vicious."

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. No, perhaps not that word; but he said it was unusual, as a general principle, and he would not advocate it.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, every man in the House, without distinction of party, voted $50,000,000 for the support of the Government in time of war to use, in the discretion of the President, and yet the gentleman from Kentucky now criticises an appropriation of $500,000 for the establishment of peace.

But I wish to say to the gentleman from Kentucky—I have not seen fit to say a word about the contingent items in the bill heretofore—I wish to say a word to him in reference to these items. There are various contingent items of expenditure provided here. I have already stated that contingent items are in the bill in every bureau in the Department, under all of the administrations of the Government. As far back almost as that time to which the memory of man runneth not to the contrary these appropriations have been made, and there are $412,000 here appropriated under the different bureaus for contingent items of expenditure.

I call the gentleman's attention to the naval appropriation bill which was passed in 1855, before our civil war in this country—a naval appropriation bill that contained an appropriation for the naval service—not $61,000,000, as this bill carries. That bill carried not over eight or ten millions of dollars, and I want to read to him just one item in the contingent appropriation of that amount.

For contingent expenses that may accrue for the following purposes.

Just as our contingent items read here in this bill. Why, every one of these contingent provisions in this bill enumerates anywhere from one to fifty items for which the appropriation is made.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question? Has he heard any objection from this side of the House or from the minority against the appropriations for contingencies under the bureaus? Does anybody raise an objection to them?

Mr. FOSS. You have raised it in your report, as I understand.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. No, sir; not an objection has been raised against the contingencies under the bureaus. It is this specific item alone that we object to.

Mr. FOSS. Now, I wish to read here. This is away back in 1855, before the war of the rebellion, when the naval appropriation bill did not amount to more than seven or eight million dollars. Yet here is a contingent item of $606,860. We find a contingent item under no bureau here that amounts to anywhere near that sum, and all taken together only amount to $412,000.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Excluding this item.

Mr. FOSS. Outside of this $500,000.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH rose.

Mr. FOSS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I hardly understand the reasoning of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER]. He says, as I understand, that if this discretion were vested in the President he would not oppose this appropriation. It is to be expended solely in the discretion of the President.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. What was the gentleman's remark?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I rose to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question a few moments ago, and it was this: You say you would not oppose this appropriation if it were to be vested in the discretion of the President.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. No; I did not use any such language.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I understood you to say that.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I was unfortunate, it seems, in my language. I said if the President had deemed it necessary to ask for it, I should have been glad to support him.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But now under the bill the money is to be expended within the discretion of the President.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. That is entirely true.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Then why not trust him?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. As it is an unnecessary appropriation, we want to keep it in the Treasury, where it belongs.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It will not get out of the Treasury unfairly nor unjustly nor dishonestly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. That is your conclusion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The President was not elected to make appropriations.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The President is not the repository of the funds of the Government.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. He is the repository of the confidence of the people to-day, and he would not abuse any such confidence.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Oh, the gentleman is growing excited about something for which there is no reason to be excited. That is nonsensical.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I shall address my remarks not to the point of order that has already been decided against us, but to the necessity and the wisdom of this appropriation.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] says that we unanimously voted for $50,000,000 to be at the disposal of the President just prior to the Spanish war. We knew then for what purpose that money was to be used.

It was whispered by the Republican leaders throughout this House that we wanted to equip a navy to meet the Spanish navy that we were going to fight in a few weeks; but I would say to the gentleman from Illinois that if this House had known that the result of that $50,000,000 would have been the permanent acquisition of the Philippine Islands with their thousands of troubles attached to our country, that bill would not have passed unanimously.

The gentleman also says this emergency fund is to be used outside of the United States. Where are our naval stations outside of the United States? I say the United States include every foot of territory under the United States flag. But the gentleman means territory outside of the United States as our country was two years ago, and those naval stations he means, as I understand it, are San Juan and Cavite, and the gentleman well knows that ample appropriations have been made for both those stations in other sections of this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here are the circumstances in which they find themselves: The President is treading around on tiptoes in the Philippine Islands and in darkness, not knowing what emergency may stare him in the face at any moment; therefore he wants to be supplied with these daggers of war or sinews of war to meet those emergencies. We know not but that he may take it into his patriotic head to purchase a naval station in some island of the south sea. We know not where he may want to carry or what he may do under the flag under the guise of an emergency.

Gentlemen, if that patriot or anarchist whom we on this side tried to elect President four years ago—I call him "anarchist" because you have tried to put him under that name—if he were in the Executive chair to-day, not one of you, not even the distinguished leader from Illinois himself [Mr. CANNON] would be in favor of putting $500,000 at his disposal when there was no specific law to that effect, and neither would the acting chairman of this committee.

When I remember the actions of the gentleman who is in the Executive chair to-day; when I see how quickly he has changed his mind upon fundamental principles of American institutions; when I see that he has changed his mind upon the Porto Rican tariff bill absolutely in three or four months—that is, if the reported remarks of the gentleman from Indiana and of the Senator from Indiana and the letter of the distinguished Speaker of this House are to be believed—that he changed his mind completely upon one of the great questions underlying our Government; that in one month he proclaimed that all blessings followed our flag and in another denies that the greatest blessing known to political man—the American Constitution—follows the flag; that he had changed his ideas upon criminal aggression and now calls the same principles he then denounced "benevolent assimilation." When I see the President giving no reasons to the country that are satisfactory even to his own party for the changes of his mind upon these great principles so suddenly, I for one consider it a bad policy and a bad precedent to put $500,000 in his hands to be expended wherever the vessels of our country may plow the seas, both in the Philippine Islands and elsewhere.

We know not into what emergency he may lead us, and from this emergency fund we know not what may emerge; and we know, whatever he does, right or wrong, when it is called into question here, members on that side of the House will every one get up here and rally around the flag and say, "You must stand by the President" because "we are in it." [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I was not so far from my seat but I heard the challenge of the gentleman from North Carolina. If his purpose was to associate me with the President of the United States, that distinguished, splendid American, nonsectional President, he could not have conferred upon me a greater honor. There has never been in the history of our country one who was more universally esteemed, more generally beloved, than the President of to-day; and I can advise the gentleman from North Carolina and I would say to every Southern Representative on that side that they will have no sympathy from the people of the South in undertaking to discredit him on this floor.

Mr. GAINES. He discredited himself.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES. He discredited himself by shifting around without giving any reason for it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAWLEY. The President of the United States discredits no one. He is an honor to this country. He does not need any defense at my hands. There is no section of our country that has not applauded the patriotism, the skill, the energy, and the true Americanism which he has shown with his national universal spirit toward every part of our country alike [loud applause on the Republican side], and particularly does this apply to the South. When he appealed to that part of our country, as he did to all of it, they rallied at once to his call.

The martial spirit of that brave and generous people responded in the same gallant fashion they have always displayed in every cause they have ever espoused; and you can not to-day go to any part of that fair and fertile land that you will not find the name of William McKinley spoken with dignity and with honor—aye, more, with affection—by that people. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.] If he has changed his mind, it is not known here. Does the gentleman want to say that a single conviction of his mind has ever undergone a change in respect to any question that affects our country's welfare? [Applause.]

I will say to the gentleman that his policy promoting our industrial interests and strengthening the financial integrity of this country has touched with the wand of inspiration the mighty engines of industry in the South—that section of our country which has more to hope for and more to build for, more to expect and more to realize than any other section of the American Republic—and to-day, while they may differ in respect to technical party differences, while they may differ somewhat in respect to some political conditions, while they may be unhappy in some of their political relations, there is not a thoughtful, serious, candid man who believes in lifting up and building up the Southern industrial life that does not applaud to-day the earnest and honest purpose of William McKinley to have the South full sharers and full partners in all the great national prosperity which has come to the American people under his Administration. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. The only thing that I remember in my speech that I suggested against the President was his change of mind. I would like to ask the gentleman, my distinguished colleague on the committee, if it is not true that the President—down, I believe, at a religious gathering last summer—stated substantially that "nothing but blessings could follow the flag;" and if he is not now taking the position that the greatest of all blessings, the Constitution of the United States, does not follow the flag?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina, that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended five minutes. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. Replying to my friend from North Carolina, when the President said that the blessings of liberty, that the happiness and pursuit of it, followed the flag, I want to ask if there is any gentleman on that side of the House that denies it? Does any man say that the flag is not the covenant of freedom wherever it floats?

I heard the gentleman from Kentucky yesterday afternoon discuss the question of the American flag as well as American armor, and I beg to ask him—as I am informed by the morning press; I did not hear the remark—if he said that a man who wore the uniform of an officer was responsible for a combine between the armor-plate plants in this country? Were you correctly reported?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I expressed it as my opinion.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the gentleman did so, it is due to himself, from his habits, from his character, and by his ancestral respectabilities, that he say to the House who it was that wore that uniform.

I speak of it here now in reply to the gentleman's question, because the flag has been borne with courage, it has been borne with honor, it has been borne in victory wherever the American soldier carried it. In planting it in every part of the world where circumstances placed us they have raised it for every man who lives there to be benefited by its influence, bettered in his condition, bettered in his home, bettered in his prospects with respect to all his future life, and better and higher in all the civilizing influences that attend it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. Evidently the gentleman did not understand my question. My question is: If the President had not said that "nothing but blessings followed the flag," and if his position was not now that the greatest of all blessings known to man, the American Constitution, does not follow the flag?

Mr. HAWLEY. Why, Mr. Chairman [laughter on the Democratic side], the question of the flag as the emblem of liberty being followed by the Constitution does not necessarily carry the Constitution with it. That is an irrelevant question, which belongs in no way to this debate. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. With the consent of the gentleman from Texas, I withdraw my question. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. That is unnecessary, because his colleague from Missouri just advised him not to answer.

Mr. HAWLEY. My colleague from Missouri is a Representative on the floor, as I am. I did not need the advice either of the gentleman from Missouri or of the gentleman from Alabama. There has not been, Mr. Chairman, a single day of history in the American Republic where we have acquired a single mile of territory that was not acquired under a Democratic President, not even Alaska. In the acquisition of that territory under the Administration that annexed it we have adopted laws and regulations that were consistent with our governmental principles and placed the Constitution there when through an act of Congress we elected to do it. Does the gentleman from North Carolina deny it?

Mr. GAINES. I deny we placed the Constitution there. It was already there. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HAWLEY. If the gentleman from Tennessee will pardon me a moment, I am having a friendly discussion with the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. HAWLEY. My statement is that every foot of territory acquired by the American Republic since its organization was acquired under a Democratic President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Give the gentleman time to complete his question.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman from Mississippi is very courteous. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina if there has been one single mile of territory acquired under any Administration except that of a Democratic President and whether it has not been determined by Congress as to what legislation or control or regulation should be prescribed, without reference to the Constitution?

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HAWLEY. No. My remark is addressed to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. KITCHIN. I understood the gentleman from Texas considered that all these islands that we had recently acquired were American territory, at least.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is not the question I asked the gentleman. It is whether these possessions have been regulated by Congress under law established by Congress under every Administration which acquired the territory?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not remember the exact date, but I will state that Alaska was acquired under a President elected by the Republican party.

Mr. HAWLEY. As a war Democrat he was before the Democratic convention in 1868 while still President, and there received 67 votes for the nomination, the great body of them from the South, and he was subsequently returned to the United States Senate from Tennessee by the Democratic party of that State.

Mr. KITCHIN. Alaska had been acquired before that time.

Mr. HAWLEY. Alaska was acquired under the Administration of Andrew Johnson when he was President of the United States, in 1867.

Mr. KITCHIN. Elected on the ticket with Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That did not hurt him any.

Mr. HAWLEY. And in this and every case in the history of our country's acquisition of new territory Congress established such laws and regulations as it saw fit, dealing with them more largely in its own good time.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate on this question has been exhausted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It so happens that I was engaged in the delightful perusal of a speech made yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts, Senator HOAR, when the gentleman from Texas asked his question, and Senator HOAR answers it so fully that I know he will be interested if I read what he says.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Read what he says about Bryan. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Later on. Indefinitely later on. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The Senator says:

> Gentlemen tell us that the bill of the gentleman from Wisconsin is copied from that introduced in Jefferson's time for the purchase of Louisiana.

Then here is Senator HOAR'S reply:

> Do you claim that you propose to deal with these people as Jefferson meant to deal with the people of Louisiana? You talk of Alaska, Florida, California; do you claim that you mean to deal with the Filipinos as we mean to deal with Alaska and as we have dealt with Florida and with California?

Now, what is the use of gentlemen talking about acts of Congress and about the general power of Congress to deal with the Territories, when the real question at issue between us is, How are you going to deal with them? How do you propose to deal with them? How do you dare to assert you are going to deal with them? And do you dare assert that you are going to deal with the Filipinos as Jefferson dealt with the people of Louisiana and as the people of Florida and California and New Mexico were dealt with at a time when, under Democratic rule, acquisitions were made to the territory of this Union? [Applause.]

Let us not hide behind words and nonsense. Let us not take refuge behind murky clouds. Let us come out. You are starting a new departure if you are starting anything. You are for the first time in the history of the American people proposing to deal with the population of annexed Territories as a population over whom the shield of the Constitution stands as no protection. You are for the first time in the history of the American people about to claim the right to legislate for people, and at the same time not to permit the very highest and most sacred form of American legislation to go to them, namely, the Constitution of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, talking about changing minds——

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Wait one moment. Talking about changing minds, I saw something the other day that came from the president of a Western university or college that struck me as very good. He said that a great many people had said, "You charge the President with changing his mind. Why, all great men change their minds! Sir Robert Peel changed his mind about free trade, and the world applauded him; Gladstone changed his mind about Irish home rule, and the world applauded him."

And then this president of this Western college, according to an extract which I cut from a newspaper—Republican at that, for the Republicans have lucid intervals now and then—said, "If I were called upon to draw a comparison between Mr. McKinley and Peel and Gladstone, I would say that Peel and Gladstone had changed their minds, but that Mr. McKinley had permitted his mind to be changed for him," and if that was ever an element of greatness, I never heard of it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is all. [Applause, during which Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi took his seat.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I have taken the floor in my own right, the gentleman refusing to recognize me.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not hear the gentleman express a desire to interrupt me.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does not the gentleman from Mississippi know that that president of that university has utterly denied that he ever made that statement? Does not the gentleman know that?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What is the gentleman's statement?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does not the gentleman from Mississippi know that the college president to whom he has referred has made a statement over his own signature that every word of that pretended interview was false; that he never made the statements attributed to him?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman has asked a question. I will answer it by saying no, I know nothing of the sort, and, further than that, the anecdote would be just as good if I had told it myself. I do not care who told it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, it may be possible that the President of the United States has changed his mind. It is a great thing that the Democratic party on this floor has got one little thing to talk about. They had a President for eight years, and they tried to get him for twelve, and they have cursed him during the last ten years, and are cursing him now. We have a President that has held the office for three years and will hold it for five more [applause on the Republican side], and the only censure that I have ever heard upon him on this floor was the fact that it is alleged by Democrats, unsupported by the truth, that he has changed his mind upon the question between free trade and 15 per cent of the Dingley law duties in the tariff with regard to Porto Rico.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit an interruption just there?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, the gentleman from Mississippi absolutely declined to allow me to interrupt him.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I would have allowed him to interrupt me if I had known what was his desire, but I did not hear the question. The House will bear me out in my statement, that I have never refused courteous treatment to my fellow-members.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well, let the gentleman go on with his question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman says that the Democrats charge, without proof, that the President of the United States changed his mind with reference to this Porto Rican tariff question. Now, will the gentleman answer this question: Did not the President of the United States recommend free trade between Porto Rico and the balance of the United States in a public message? Is it not further true—for the two go together—is it not furthermore true that he stated to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] and to the gentleman from the Cincinnati district of Ohio, and to other gentlemen as well, that he had changed his mind and was now in favor of the bill you passed here? Now, if it be not true that he told these gentlemen that, then they are guilty of the untruth and not we who believed them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, it is quite equal to the gentleman to take possession of the floor under the five-minute debate under the pretense of asking me a question, and make a series of statements in the form of an interrogatory addressed to me. That is not exactly fair treatment on the part of the gentleman from Mississippi, and the gentleman knows it very well, while standing upon his feet and pretending to be a gentleman and interrupting a fellow-member——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not understand the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, you took five minutes to make a speech in my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I only asked the gentleman a question by his own consent; and the question I have propounded is certainly no excuse for the gentleman losing his temper.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not "lost my temper," I will say to the gentleman, when he uses such a term as that, and I do not desire to be lectured by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The "gentleman from Mississippi" is not lecturing the gentleman from Ohio, and would not assume to do so. I have treated the gentleman with perfect courtesy in all respects, and must have courtesy in return.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understood the gentleman in his remarks to allude in a discourteous manner to the statements that I have made.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I made no such allusion. The gentleman is acting under a misapprehension. I am, or try to be, always courteous, and I shall insist upon and enforce courtesy from every other man on this floor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman undertook to make a series of statements in the course of my remarks——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I only asked a question of the gentleman, which is not unprecedented in the action of the House on these occasions. The gentleman from Ohio yielded to me for that purpose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And if the gentleman from Ohio means to say that there was anything "ungentlemanly" in my asking the question, then the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. GROSVENOR. "The gentleman from Ohio" did not say that; he simply meant to say that it was unfair on the part of the gentleman from Mississippi to take up his time in that way, under the five-minute debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But the gentleman gave me the privilege of asking the question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did, to ask a simple question, but not to make a speech. The gentleman knew that as well as I do. I regret very much that the gentleman from Mississippi could not have allowed me to make a speech under the five-minute rule without an unpleasant intervention like this. I have never done such a thing to him or anybody else on this floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have an additional five minutes. I did not intend to consume his time without his consent, of course.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am very glad the gentleman from Mississippi says that. It was almost apparent to me that his object was to prevent me from saying what I had desired to say.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us examine what has been done and learn the value of the sentiments which have been expressed here in this discussion. I hope I may, like other gentlemen on this side of the House, make a statement without groaning and interruptions and yelling on the other side of the House.

What is the question presented here? We have listened with patience to the bitter denunciations of the President of the United States on the part of the gentleman from North Carolina and others, who saw proper to interject the point of order a few moments ago upon this provision of the pending bill. In response to that I desired to submit a few remarks when I was interrupted, and beg leave to do so now.

I can say to those gentlemen who are making these charges of a change of mind on the part of the President a word: I want to point out to them how nearly the whole subject is swept away by the application of the rule of de minimis. We had in this country a tariff law that rests upon the people of Porto Rico today to the full extent of the Dingley law, and every Democratic vote cast on this floor and every Republican vote cast on this floor against this bill was in its effect, if it had been potential enough to defeat the bill, sufficient to have continued that whole Dingley tariff upon the products of Porto Rico during the balance of this fiscal year.

Now, the President sent a message to Congress, and it has been the delight of our friends on the other side to harp upon that message, in which he said that it was our plain duty to give free trade to Porto Rico, recognizing at the time that very doctrine which you on the other side of this House have denied all the way through, recognizing the doctrine that the Constitution did not go by virtue of itself into the islands, or else his suggestion of free trade would have been ridiculous, and every member of the House on either side would have said so.

And when you proposed to vote for a free-trade measure, you recognized the fact that the Constitution did not, of its own force, go to the island of Porto Rico. Your very vote stands recorded here that there was no operation of the Constitution in Porto Rico, else there was no need of any legislation, and your vote in favor of a free-trade amendment to the bill was idle.

The President suggested just that much and no more.

Mr. KITCHIN. May I ask the gentleman just one question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. As the gentleman knows, my statements were going to show the change of mind of the President. Does the gentleman deny that the President has changed his mind?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am trying to get to that point, if the gentleman will let me go on.

As soon as it became manifest to the President that money had to be raised in some way and that the Ways and Means Committee of this House had brought in a tariff bill providing for 15 per cent or 25 per cent, the President recognized the right and power of this House of Representatives to originate that tariff bill.

That power was given to it by the Constitution. It was the duty, the obligation of the House of Representatives; and the gentleman will find by an examination of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that up to the very last moment of the passage of that Porto Rican bill gentlemen on the other side of this House by scores insisted that the President was still in favor of free trade in Porto Rico, and newspapers from one end of this continent to the other claimed that we, on this side of the House, were in a contest with the President; that the President never had changed his mind—that he was still in favor of free trade.

But I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the message of the President he gave no sign or indication of when he desired that that free-trade measure should go into effect; and when the Congress of the United States came to pass the bill that you voted against, when you voted in favor of continuing the Dingley bill, pure and simple, we, by our vote, put it so that within the next sixty days, within the next ninety days, within the next four months, any time after the organization of that government, the people of Porto Rico can have free trade by their own choice and their own action.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks without limit.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I only care for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, the President, recognizing the authority of Congress to originate that tariff bill, recognizing the fact that the exclusive right to originate it was in the House of Representatives, the President has signed it, and thereby given his approval to it. Is it possible that the gentleman, in charging that the President of the United States has changed his mind, in charging him with being a fickle man, unfitted for the high position which he occupies——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me finish my sentence; because he has had one opinion at one time and has approved the act of the authority of the taxing power of the Government and signed the measure, is it possible that the gentleman has overlooked the right and the duty of the President so to do?

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GROSVENOR. How often has the gentleman from North Carolina known a President of the United States to sign a bill that he was not absolutely in favor of.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to ask you a pertinent question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does not the gentleman know that the honored Speaker of this House wrote a letter which was published, and from that which was published in that letter every man understood that the President was in full accord with the bill then pending, and when the President sent his message to this House was he sending it to this one or to the one two years from now when he spoke about the "plain duty?"

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will say to the gentleman that he and his compatriots who are to be here in the next House—that they will be talking about this change of mind even then. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] It is the only thing you have ever had in the history of William McKinley to hang your hat on or that you could criticise.

Mr. KITCHIN. And you ought not object to our doing so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is the first thing in his whole life. He joined in the opinion of this House; he was not afraid of Democratic criticism; he was not afraid of newspaper criticism. When he saw that the arrangement made by the Committee on Ways and Means and ratified by the House would give to Porto Rico the money that they were suffering for, he saw fit to waive any original opinion that he had, and which was practically carried into effect by the bill, and approved the judgment that he had later on. And how small it is, my friends, this 15 per cent on 100 per cent, 24 cents on the hundred pounds on sugar, as against 160 that you indirectly voted for.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. If the President of the United States, from further knowledge of the facts, changed his opinion on the Porto Rican tariff, why did not he say so to the House of Representatives?

Mr. GROSVENOR. How often have you known the President to approve a bill and send his reasons to the House of Representatives for doing so?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. He sent a message recommending one thing and changed for another.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He never sent a message recommending "one thing"—— [Cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. He sent a message in which he said that it was our plain duty to give free trade to Porto Rico.

Mr. GROSVENOR. At what date did he fix it? Now come the groans from the pit. [Great laughter on the Republican side.] When did he fix the date that it was to be the law?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say this: The President recommended free trade to Porto Rico.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He did not fix the date, for the very manifest reason that he recommended action by Congress.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The gentleman is equivocal.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He is not equivocal. What is the difference, my friend, between fixing the date of a law when, if there had been no opposition upon the other side, this free-trade law would have been in effect practically in Porto Rico to-day; but because you had given the whole winter to talking about the Constitution following the flag and the flag following the Constitution [laughter on the Republican side], and naked heathens rushing around with Washington's Farewell Address as their guiding star [laughter], this long delay has been made necessary.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Let us get back to the original proposition. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Do not go back.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. For how long?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. For ten minutes, or so much longer as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended for ten minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is, the time for the gentleman from Kentucky and myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I want to say to the gentleman that he is pursuing his customary adroitness in avoiding the question at bar. The President of the United States certainly knew what he was talking about when he told the Congress that it was their plain duty to admit goods from Porto Rico without tariff, and he meant that we should do so at once. Now, if he changed his opinion on that question, pending the debate on the Hawaiian tariff, I would like the gentleman to say if it would not have been right for the President to deal fairly with the representatives of the American people and say why he changed his opinion?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say he has not changed his opinion.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. You said so less than five minutes ago.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not said he changed his mind.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It was changed for him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no language to characterize an argument like that. I am talking to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The question I asked of the gentleman was in perfect courtesy.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not complaining of you; I am complaining of the constant interruptions by groans and all these attempts to assail an argument that is being made in perfect good faith. Now, if the gentleman will allow me, the point that he was trying to bring out, if I understood, was that the President was in favor of free trade in Porto Rico?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That he called upon Congress to act?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That when Congress did act he approved the judgment of Congress, and not only that, but, in my opinion, became decidedly of the opinion that the delay which was put into the bill in order that there might be a Territorial government or a colonial government formed there was better than precipitating free trade, as the gentleman undertakes to say the message implied, and which I deny.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Now will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The gentleman says that the President of the United States bows to the will of Congress. Without being able to turn to the page of the RECORD, I am sure the gentleman will not deny that from his place where he stands, in the debate on the Porto Rican question, when he appealed to his colleagues to support the pending bill, he charged it to be true that the President of the United States was then in accord with him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say so now.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. He changed his opinion——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say he did not change his opinion in any material respect; he simply changed from the original idea of free trade to what was almost the condition of free trade that we appended to the measure. I want to say to the gentleman that it is evidence of the smallness and the littleness of the Democratic position that that is all that they have got against the President of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. If the gentleman will pardon me once more, I desire to say that the Democratic party does not criticise the President of the United States for changing his opinion. We respect a man who honestly changes his opinion if he finds reasons to justify it. What we condemn him for is allowing his message to stand unchanged to the country and leaving it to stand upon reasons secretly communicated to his colleagues, and not giving it to the country. That is what we complain of. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is mistaken in one important fact. There is so little difference, so unimportant, so contemptible a difference between the position of actual free trade and almost free trade that we have given them, with free trade at the option of the people of Porto Rico within sixty days, that I say it is too small for the President of the United States to be criticised about.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to finish what I have to say. The country is taking exactly this view of it. Congressman after Congressman who have stood here and acted in its behalf have gone to their constituents, just when the Democratic noise was the loudest, and have been sent back here with a unanimity almost unparalleled in the nomination of Congressmen. And the great body at Philadelphia, the Manufacturers' Association, on yesterday approved the Porto Rican bill, the very body that a few weeks ago was quoted on this floor as opposed to it. [Applause on the Republican side.] And from one end of this country to the other the people of this country are taking care of it.

The Republican party will not lose any votes in the coming election because of their action on the Porto Rican bill, because they have stood by their principles, by the principles of Jefferson and Adams and all the Presidents who have acquired territory in this country, and have said, not that the blessings of our Government do not go to these islands of their own motion, but they have said that the terms and the details upon which the laws and the Constitution and blessings of equal citizenship shall go to them by an act of Congress under the persuasive influence of the Constitution that shall give them all the liberty that we have already given to Hawaii and Porto Rico. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We have got something to show for our principles and contentions. We are not holding back by the coat tails of the world and holloaing "Whoa!" [laughter on the republican side]; we have got something to show for our opinions. Witness the splendid organization of the government of Hawaiian Territory. Look at the liberal, generous, Christian-like constitution and laws that we have bestowed upon the people of Porto Rico.

Look at the fact that, but for the intervention of a few men on this side of the water, we should have extended the same benefits of the Constitution, the same liberty of American citizenship, in embryo at least, to the people of the Philippine Islands. But we would not consent—and that is your trouble, my friends—we would not consent that you should drive us to admit that the people of Porto Rico and the people of the Philippine Islands were upon an equal footing with the people of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We would not consent that ship loads and millions and millions of Malays and all those people might come over here and march into our labor markets, and we will make it warm for you before the campaign is over. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] You voted that the Constitution of the United States carried equal citizenship to the Malays and the Chinese of the Philippine Islands, and that is your position to-day. It is your complaint that we would not let you do it, but in due time, under the wisdom of the Republican party and under the blessings of God we will send liberty and equal rights as rapidly as they can comprehend them to the people of Porto Rico and to the people of the Philippine Islands. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman stated that the people of Porto Rico would get free trade when they desired it. I would like to ask him through what channel will they be permitted to exercise that right?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Through the election of members to the legislative body.

Mr. TERRY. And who appoint the men that control the legislature?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The people of Porto Rico elect the representative body.

Mr. TERRY. They elect their representative body in districts that have been fixed by the executive council.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That may be; I do not know. The gentleman is entering upon a field which he will find troublesome.

Mr. TERRY. I recollect reading the provisions of the Porto Rico bill on this subject, and according to my recollection the executive council will fix the districts to elect the members of the delegates of the people of Porto Rico.

Mr. DAYTON. I rise to a point of order—that this debate is not germane to the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am through.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] ought to have raised that point a little earlier.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to say, with all courtesy, that this debate was started by the gentleman from Mississippi; he has been answered by the gentleman from Ohio, and now it is time for the controversy to cease.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The discussion was not started by me, but by some one else.

Mr. DAYTON. It was started by the gentleman from North Carolina and participated in by you.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask the consent of the House to occupy five minutes more, as I wish to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to insist on the rule. The understanding was that when we undertook the discussion of this appropriation bill there would be no partisan debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Mississippi to proceed for five minutes? The Chair hears none; and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, as a man grows old he learns some things. I am not so old that I can not learn. I have learned something to-day. I will never again while a member of the American Congress undertake to ask a question of any member on this floor who is not sufficiently well versed in the ordinary courtesies and decencies of human intercourse as to be capable of returning at least a polite reply to a polite inquiry.

Further than that it would be almost impossible for me, without a breach of parliamentary rules, to express myself upon that particular subject—the subject of the conduct of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in our colloquy a moment ago.

I asked the gentleman from Ohio a question which he either could not answer or would not answer, or else, in his usual lawyerlike politician style, desired to evade. That question has never been answered by him yet.

The gentleman had said on this floor that the President of the United States had not changed his mind upon the Porto Rican question; that the charge was a Democratic falsehood. Remember, I did not charge that he had. What I charged was that he had permitted others to change his mind for him, which, in my opinion, was not a thing of which any man could at any time be especially proud.

But, in charity to the President and in charity to many of the members of this House, I asked the gentleman, when he denied that the President had changed his mind, that he permit me to ask a question, and he yielded.

I asked him whether the President had not in a public message announced that he was in favor of free trade between Porto Rico and the balance of the United States, and also whether various members of this House had not risen, one after another, to say that the President had told them in private conversation subsequently that he was at the time of the conversation in favor of the bill which passed the House, a bill fixing a tariff between Porto Rico and the balance of the United States.

There was nothing rude in that inquiry; there was nothing personal in it; there was nothing discourteous in it; there was nothing unprecedented in it; there was nothing in it that could have stirred up wrath in the breast of any man except one who felt himself in a corner and as if he had to break up the convention in a row in order to keep from arriving at an election. That is all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman will allow me to explain.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, then, that question has not been answered by the gentleman yet.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me say that I had no feeling about the question——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If the gentleman had no feeling, he ought to have answered. He ought to know what plain English means, and he ought to know when and where and how to use plain English understandingly and courteously.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I complained only of the gentleman taking up my time with statements which were not questions.

Now, as to the statements of the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Vermont, I know nothing about what the President said to them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman will now excuse me. I did not "use up his time." I only asked a question, and that only after he had yielded.

Do these gentlemen who came before this House and said that they had private conversations with the President of the United States and that he urged them to vote for the Porto Rican bill, or the Speaker of this House, who wrote a public letter stating that the President wanted the bill voted for, or did the Senator from Indiana, who made a statement on the floor of the Senate to the same effect, tell the truth or tell a falsehood? If they did tell the truth, and they have not the reputation of liars, one of two things is necessarily a fair inference; either that the President changed his mind or that he had his mind changed for him.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have merely stated in general my interrogatory to the gentleman from Ohio as to what is a matter of common public knowledge, and I did not expect that a question of that kind, although it might be rather inconvenient to answer, would have turned out so great a volume of wrath.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman allow an interruption just there?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. Do you have any objection, under a republican form of government, to a President elected by the American people obeying the will of Congress?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Ah, Mr. Chairman, that sounds very much like a recent pronunciamento of a new-fledged candidate for the Presidency, whose idea of the high office is that a man who sits in the seat occupied once by Washington and Jefferson and Jackson need be only one who can keep his ear to the ground and find out what is "going on" amongst the people of the country around him, and after he catches the current needs only to float on its surface.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I had some other things to say, Mr. Chairman, but will not insist upon occupying the floor any longer.

Mr. FOSS. I call for a vote.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSS. I have asked for a vote, Mr. Chairman, on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on the amendments.

Mr. TERRY. I only wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the Porto Rican act, in reference to a matter in which we differ [cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]—Oh, I have heard that cry of "Vote!" before. I say I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to a matter in connection with this Porto Rican bill which he seems to have lost sight of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated to the gentleman from Arkansas that debate on this proposition is exhausted.

Mr. TERRY. I move to strike out the last word, or the last line, if necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on that proposition is exhausted.

Mr. TERRY. Then I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Ohio for a few minutes.

Mr. DAYTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

The question is on the pro forma amendment. Is that withdrawn? The Chair will regard it as being withdrawn, and hears no objection to the suggestion.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina to strike out the language in the provision of the bill which has just been read—on page 4 to strike out lines 12, 13, and 14.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 92, noes 93.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The Chair appointed Mr. FOSS and Mr. KITCHIN as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 104.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

Transportation, recruiting, and contingent: For expenses of recruiting for the naval service; rent of rendezvous and expenses of maintaining the same; advertising for men and boys, and all other expenses attending the recruiting for the naval service, and for the transportation of enlisted men and boys at home and abroad and of officers accompanying them; for heating apparatus for receiving and training ships, and extra expenses thereof; for freight, telegraphing on public business, postage on letters sent abroad, stationery, maps, railway guides, city directories, and necessary books of reference, ferriage, ice, apprehension of deserters and stragglers, continuous-service certificates, discharges, good-conduct badges, and medals for boys, schoolbooks for training apprentices, packing boxes and materials, and other contingent expenses and emergencies arising under cognizance of the Bureau of Navigation, unforeseen, and impossible to classify, $80,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order upon the following words, in line 25, page 4, of the paragraph just read:

Stationery, maps, railway guides, city directories, and necessary books of reference.

I make the point of order upon the following grounds: This is a contingent appropriation for the Bureau of Navigation in connection with the naval service outside of the Department at Washington. These words appear in the naval appropriation bill here for the first time. The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for many years past, since 1870 and certainly since 1876, provides for the current and contingent expenses in this regard of the naval establishment in the following words:

For stationery, furnishing newspapers, plans, drawings and drawing materials, horses and wagons to be used only for official purposes, for expressage, postage, and other absolutely necessary expenses of the Navy Department, and of the various bureaus and officers, $12,000.

Now, the Committee on Appropriations, from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, have had that jurisdiction in the legislative, judicial, and executive appropriation bill for the Navy Department proper. Of course, appropriations for the maintenance of the naval establishment other than for these contingencies are under the jurisdiction of the Naval Committee.

Now, these words on which I make the point of order are words providing a contingent fund for the Bureau of Navigation in the Navy Department proper, which are therefore subject to the point of order under the ruling that the Speaker made on a question that was raised on the Army appropriation bill, and ought not to be in the bill on the merits, because it but duplicates an appropriation in part that is made in the legislative bill.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him just what words he refers to?

Mr. CANNON. I refer to the words "stationery, maps, railway guides, city directories, and necessary books of reference."

Mr. DAYTON. That is all, is it?

Mr. CANNON. That is all.

Mr. FOSS. I would state to the gentleman that the Bureau are exceedingly anxious for this provision. Under the present law they state that they are unable to buy any city directories. Rear-Admiral Crowninshield said:

We can not buy a city directory. We have to borrow one when we want to see one.

So that, if the Committee on Appropriations does appropriate for these things, it is evident that the Navy Department has not got them or can not get them. And, under the testimony of Admiral Crowninshield, it appears that they can not get them.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I will say to my friend that the language in the legislative bill, after mentioning stationery and other articles, says:

And other absolutely necessary expenses of the Navy Department.

Now, I will state to my friend that the provision for stationery, and so forth, in the legislative bill, is broad enough to cover city directories and every other absolutely necessary expense.

Mr. FOSS. Now, right there, I should like to ask the gentleman whether it is broad enough, for instance, to allow the Department to buy Brassey's Naval Annual?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. FOSS. And other books of naval reference?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly; quite broad enough; but the admiral that he refers to, instead of coming to the committee that had and has jurisdiction upon deficiency bills, as well as upon the legislative bill, prefers to have $80,000, and under this authorization he may buy a library of $25,000 or of $10,000. I do not say he would, but the distinction between the maintenance of the naval establishment, for which the naval appropriation bill carries the appropriation, and the appropriation for the Navy Department here in Washington is well defined. The legislative bill carries the latter, the naval bill carries the former, and this but duplicates the provision in the legislative bill, and appears now for the first time in this bill and is subject to the point of order.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman pardon me one moment? Will he tell me how in the world your committee have jurisdiction, in the legislative bill, of such a matter as furnishing stationery for the Navy Department?

Mr. CANNON. It has always had it.

Mr. DAYTON. Do you not think you had better surrender that?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all.

Mr. DAYTON. Why not?

Mr. CANNON. Why, for every reason. Here is the legislative bill that provides the whole force of the Navy Department here in Washington and has always provided it, and it ought to remain there.

Mr. DAYTON. Might you not as well take the ice and the heating apparatus and all that and put it on the legislative bill?

Mr. CANNON. We do take every dollar of it; and your appropriation here for contingencies in this bill, with this exception, is an appropriation for the naval service.

Mr. DAYTON. Why, you might as well——

Mr. CANNON. Let me answer your question.

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. For the naval establishment, for the service outside of the Navy Department proper, which is here in Washington.

Mr. DAYTON. You might as well surround the whole business and appropriate for it on the legislative bill, might you not?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all. All we want is to be let alone.

Mr. DAYTON. You do not want to be let alone when you are making appropriations for the Navy Department on improper bills, when you are appropriating items that ought to be included in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend understands about the jurisdiction of the various committees, he understands that the Navy Department in all its personnel, its Assistant Secretary, its clerks, its contingent fund here in Washington, is carried by appropriations in the legislative bill and that the Naval Committee have no jurisdiction under the rules of the House to report an appropriation for that, and because you undertake to duplicate an appropriation where your committee have no jurisdiction I make the point of order upon those words.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman pardon me one moment?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Will my friend allow me a minute? How is it with regard to the Army?

Mr. CANNON. The same way precisely in regard to the Army.

Mr. DAYTON. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. CUMMINGS. How is it in regard to the Army?

Mr. CANNON. The same way precisely in regard to the Army.

Mr. DAYTON. Pardon me, I do not know but what we will reach an agreement. Do you not believe that city directories, Brassey's Naval Annual, are just as much a part of the equipment of the Navy as any other part of the equipment?

Mr. CANNON. It is not a part of the equipment—stationery, maps, railroad guides, city directories, and necessary books of reference.

Mr. DAYTON. It is for postage on letters sent abroad, stationery, maps, railway guides, city directories, Brassey's Naval Annual, and other necessary books of reference for the benefit of our ships when they go abroad.

Mr. CANNON. I beg your pardon; I say this appears now for the first time in this bill; and that is fatal to it. I turn to a provision that provides for a contingent fund for the Navy Department that includes all these items. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. DAYTON. I say that it is a part of the equipment of the naval establishment and the naval establishment is established.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I admit that this is new language; probably new legislation; and if the gentleman wishes to make the point of order to strike out this provision, I have nothing further to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, in the course of a colloquy with my distinguished friend from Ohio a few minutes ago, in which I was cut off, there arose a difference of opinion between us as to the provisions contained in the Porto Rican bill, and in the course of his very fervid remarks he stated that the people of Porto Rico could have free trade whenever they desired it. I asked him through what channel they could express their desire. He stated, as I understood him, that it would be through the delegates elected by them. Here is the bill. It provides that it shall be done by the "legislative assembly" of Porto Rico; that whenever they have passed a bill for local taxation, and so forth, and have adopted a resolution so notifying the President, then certain things may be done to put an end to tariff duties. It is the legislative assemble and not simply the delegates elected by the people of Porto Rico.

What composes the legislative assembly of Porto Rico are the two houses then existing, namely, the executive council, six of whom, a majority, may be appointed by the President from non-residents; and the executive council and the house of delegates constitute the general assembly of Porto Rico. So it is not by the delegates of the house, elected by the inhabitants of Porto Rico; and, furthermore, I asked him if it were not a fact that the legislative districts from which these delegates may be elected were under the control of the executive council, and he intimated that that was not true.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not hear you make any such statement as that.

Mr. TERRY. The RECORD will show. I understood the gentleman to so state.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I answered an entirely different matter, as I understood.

Mr. TERRY. You stated, as I understood, that the delegates elected by the people were to determine that question. I say that that is not correct. I say these gentlemen who are to form the executive council have control of them; and not only that, but it is also provided that the executive council shall control the mapping out of the districts. Everybody knows what can be done by gerrymandering; at least some of us know. It also provides, in section 28, that for the purpose of the election of these delegates Porto Rico shall be divided by the executive council into seven districts, composed of, etc., so that at least when you told this committee that the people of Porto Rico could determine as to free trade, it was a delusion and a snare. They can do no such thing; and, as the gentleman from Ohio, in effect, taunted me with not knowing anything of the Porto Rican bill, I commend to him a careful reading of that bill himself.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I think I said, and the notes I think will show it at the proper time, that I said the legislative body could fix this.

Mr. TERRY. You said the delegates elected by the people of Porto Rico, as I understood you.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not. I beg to say that.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You can not raise a point of order until I get through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia raises the point of order.

Mr. DAYTON. I raise the point of order against any discussion that is not germane to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If it is to hurry the work on, you will find that you are only losing time by that policy.

Mr. DAYTON. I am objecting to this partisan discussion about a matter on which there ought to be a unanimity of sentiment on both sides.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If anybody will cut me off by a strict application of the rules after the statement has been made by the gentleman from Arkansas without allowing a reply——

Mr. TERRY. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the point of order, and give my friend from Ohio a chance.

Mr. DAYTON. I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF ORDNANCE.

Ordnance and ordnance stores: For procuring, producing, preserving, and handling ordnance material; for the armament of ships; for fuel, material, and labor to be used in the general work of the Ordnance Department; for watchmen at magazines; for furniture in ordnance buildings at navy-yards and stations; for maintenance of the proving ground and powder factory; for target practice, and for increasing the efficiency of the Ordnance Department, $500,000.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In the course of the debate on yesterday I asked the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] a question. I asked if he did not support the law passed by the Fifty-fifth Congress to erect a smokeless gunpowder factory for the Government. He did not deny he voted for it, but said we ordered it built because we were then at war with Spain.

As I remember, the Republican party as a unit in the House supported that measure, and in addition to that I find on inquiry at the Navy Department that the Secretary of the Navy, before the war and in 1897, requested Congress to erect a powder factory. War was declared against Spain in April, 1898. So the statement that we had a war on and hence ordered the building of this factory falls to the ground. The historic fact is, that Congress, by request of the Secretary of the Navy, authorized the appropriation before the war.

Now, you will find that the Secretary in his recent report commends the establishment of this powder factory in this language:

The Government powder factory at Indian Head is progressing favorably. It is neither expected nor desired to enter into competition at these works with private manufacturers, except as to quality, it being the policy of the Department to foster the commercial industry, upon which the country must largely draw for its supply.

I find in the Secretary's report for 1897, on page 295, the statement of Admiral O'Neil, requesting Congress to erect this powder factory. I desire the House to listen attentively to the particular language that I shall now read. Admiral O'Neil said:

The Bureau is of opinion that for national and economic reasons the Department should own and operate a smokeless-powder factory, at which it could produce a part of the powder required for the naval service, and an item has been inserted in the annual estimates for this purpose. The property known as Bellevue Magazine, on the Potomac just below Washington, would be an excellent site, and it is conveniently reached by water and by railroad, and it is but two hours' distance from the naval proving ground. The present price of the smokeless powder procured by purchase is very high, and the Bureau believes it can produce it in large quantities at a greatly reduced price. The success of the Bureau with its gun factory encourages it to believe that it could do equally well in the manufacture of other munitions of war.

Our gun factory, he says, is such a success he urges a Government powder factory, and Mr. Secretary Long indorsed his recommendation.

It will be seen that in the Fifty-fifth Congress, on the recommendation of Mr. Secretary Long, we passed an appropriation going into millions of dollars to erect a powder factory, including a smokeless-powder factory; and what for? In order that we might crush the "monopoly" that has had the United States Government by the throat; that he might get a better quality of powder; that he might get more powder for the same amount of money; that we might have the machinery in our own hands, and not be the victims, as we have been heretofore, as in the case of our armor plate, of the manufacturers.

Mr. Long says, page 22, in his report for 1897, that there was a "lack of sufficient competition among private manufacturers." We make naval clothing at our New York naval factory. This is indorsed by Mr. Long and the Congress; and yet the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], always alert about appropriations, twitted the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS] on yesterday, or the day before, because he asserted, in the splendid argument he then made, that he was in favor of making some of our ships at our public factories.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I ask five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Tennessee will proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, let me say that I do not know exactly who recommended the establishment of our gun factory, where we are making our splendid Springfield rifles and our splendid guns of other kinds in the city of Washington, and the heavy ordnance for the Navy, but I do know that President Lincoln was so embarrassed during the war of 1861–1865, that in his message of December, 1863, he uses this clear and unmistakable language:

The change that has taken place in naval vessels and naval warfare since the introduction of steam as a motive power for ships of war demands either a corresponding change in some of our existing navy-yards or the establishing of new ones for the construction and necessary repair of modern naval vessels.

Now listen:

No inconsiderable embarrassment, delay, and public injury have been experienced from the want of such governmental establishments.

That is, that as a government we will own the establishments which make our naval and war material.

He wanted a Government establishment to make our naval and war material. Mr. Chairman, I am as much opposed as any man in this House or elsewhere to the Government engaging in what is known as private industries. But in making armor plate and powder the power is clear and complete to do so. They are governmental duties. Look at our postal system. Right along in the same section of the Constitution in which Congress is given the power to create the Army and Navy we find it gives it the power to create a postal system of the United States. No man will deny that the Government of the United States has the power to go and buy horses and buy wagons and make mail bags. I believe they are now making mail bags that carry the mails throughout the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the power is present in Congress. We have the constitutional right, and it is a question now whether we shall stand enthralled in the hands of the armor-plate men or go one step further and say that we propose to disarm that monopoly that has been holding up the Government of the United States in war and in peace. They speak about holding up our war vessels; that they are still naked for the want of armor plate. Mr. Chairman, that is not true. These two concerns have been holding up the Government of the United States and not the vessels. They have held up the President, they have held up the American Congress, and it is our duty to put a stop to it, and I propose at a later day to call the attention of Congress to facts going to show that that is the fact. Secretary Long wisely said in his report the reason why he wanted a factory for the Government was to overcome the monopoly that was dictating the price of powder to the Government of the United States, not only, Mr. Chairman, in time of peace but in time of war, and now we want to crush the armor trust. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BINGHAM having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On April 17, 1900:

On April 18, 1900:

H. R. 1092. An act to set apart a portion of the Arlington estate for experimental agricultural purposes, and to place said portion under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture and his successors in office; and

H. R. 2356. An act for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Equipment of vessels: For purchase of coal for steamers' and ships' use, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling the same; hemp, wire, iron, and other materials for the manufacture of cordage, anchors, cables, galleys, and chains; canvas for the manufacture of sails, awnings, hammocks, and other work; water for all purposes on board naval vessels, including the expenses of transportation and storage of the same; stationery for commanding and navigating officers of ships, equipment officers on shore and afloat, and for the use of courts-martial on board ship; the removal and transportation of ashes from ships of war; interior appliances and tools for equipment buildings in navy-yards and naval stations, and for the purchase of all other articles of equipment at home and abroad, and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels and manufacture of equipment articles in the several navy-yards; foreign and local pilotage and towage of ships of war; services and materials in repairing, correcting, adjusting, and testing compasses on shore and on board ship; nautical and astronomical instruments, and repairs to same; libraries for ships of war; professional books and papers, and drawings and engravings for signal books; naval signals and apparatus, namely, signals, lights, lanterns, rockets, running lights, compass fittings, including binnacles, tripods, and other appendages of ships' compasses; logs and other appliances for measuring the ship's way, and leads and other appliances for sounding; lanterns and lamps, and their appendages, for general use on board ship for illuminating purposes, and oil and candles used in connection therewith; bunting and other materials for making and repairing flags of all kinds; photographic instruments and materials; musical instruments and music; installing, maintaining, and repairing interior and exterior signal communications and all electrical appliances of whatsoever nature on board naval vessels, except range finders, battle order and range transmitters and indicators, and motors and their controlling apparatus used to operate the machinery belonging to other bureaus, $2,600,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. This language appears to be at the bottom of page 15:

Except range finders, battle order and range transmitters and indicators, and motors and their controlling apparatus used to operate the machinery belonging to other bureaus, $2,600,000.

What is the object, may I ask the gentleman, of that language? And does it by law, in effect, while it is a matter of appropriation, change the jurisdiction between the Bureau of Equipment and other bureaus?

Mr. FOSS. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that that language is in correspondence with Order No. 86, regulating the matters between the Bureau of Ordnance and the Bureau of Equipment. There are certain appliances mentioned in this clause beginning with the word "except" which are properly within the Bureau of Ordnance and will be so considered and regarded hereafter. It is a matter of regulation purely between the departments, the regulation of their own concerns.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose the necessity for the change comes from the fact that electricity has come into use as a motor and makes some adjustment necessary, different from that which obtained heretofore between these bureaus.

Mr. FOSS. That is as I understand it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do you understand that the Ordnance Department has accepted this change?

Mr. DAYTON. Oh, yes; it is in accordance with an order of the Secretary of the Navy, and is to carry out their adjustment.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Ocean and lake surveys: Ocean and lake surveys; the publication and care of the results thereof; the purchase of nautical books, charts, and sailing directions, and freight and express charges on the same; for the survey of the island of Guam, and continuing the surveys of the imperfectly known parts of the coasts and harbors of the Philippine Archipelago, of the Hawaiian group, and of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, with their bordering keys and waters and the minor outlying islands, deep-sea soundings and other observations for the survey of suboceanic telegraph cable routes; determinations of the magnetic variation, and other observations necessary for the construction of charts for the correction of the mariner's compass in oceanic navigation, and continuing the investigations and charting of reported obstructions to navigation in the United States waters of the Great Lakes, including the hire of vessels and the compensation, not otherwise appropriated for, of persons employed in the field work, under the authority of the Secretary of the Navy, and for every expenditure requisite for making hydrographic surveys that are required under the regulations for the government of the Navy, $100,000, and any unexpended balance of the appropriation for ocean and lake surveys for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, is hereby also appropriated.

During the reading of the above paragraph the following took place:

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to secure all rights with reference to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has not concluded the reading of the paragraph. It will not be in order until the paragraph is concluded.

The Clerk proceeded and finished the paragraph.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to raise a point of order on this section, against so much of it as commences with the word "continuing," in line 13, and ending with the word "Navy," on line 18. There are points of order that might be raised as to other portions of this section, but I myself desire to call attention of the committee to this part particularly.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order against the whole paragraph, and I trust that the gentleman from Ohio will deem that to be sufficient for his present purposes.

Mr. BROMWELL. I am willing to do that.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts (continuing). So that we may have a discussion on the merits. I am with the gentleman. Then we will decide whether it shall be decided on its merits or——

Mr. BROMWELL. I am willing that the point of order shall be reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Massachusetts to reserve a point of order on the whole paragraph.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Against that part of the paragraph indicated by the gentleman from Ohio and the whole paragraph. I suppose if any part of it is obnoxious to a point of order the whole paragraph is.

Mr. BROMWELL. The portion of the paragraph to which I am calling attention begins with the words "and continuing," in line 13, and ends with the word "Navy," in line 18.

Mr. CANNON. I believe I have the floor, and I want to submit a proposition to the gentleman, if I can have his attention and that of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. My suggestion is this: That the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] reserve the point of order for the present. If that be done, then I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois in charge of the bill that, so far as I am concerned, I am quite willing that this matter should come up to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal, and the merits of this whole section be then considered by the Committee of the Whole.

I make this suggestion for this reason: While I believe the whole paragraph to be subject to a point of order, I recognize the fact that if there can be sufficient general debate—I do not mean more than sufficient—and then debate under the five-minute rule, we might just as well dispose of this matter to-morrow, because it is perfectly patent from the surrounding circumstances that when this bill goes to the Senate, although the section might go out on a point of order here, it would be restored there, and would have to be fought over later in the session on the merits. So that I submit to my friend from Massachusetts and my friend from Ohio that if we can get reasonable time for debate, reserving the point of order in the meantime, it would perhaps be wise to determine this matter upon its merits after full consideration and debate by the House touching the merits of the whole question.

Mr. BROMWELL. If the gentleman from Illinois means to suggest that the point of order be waived ultimately and the question on its merits submitted to the House, I ought to say that my own view in regard to this particular section of the bill and this particular part of the section is so strong that I would not be willing to waive the point of order if it is a good one and take the vote of the House upon the merits.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose, then, that for the present we agree (if it suits the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Ohio) that the matter go over until to-morrow morning, when there shall be an hour's general debate on each side upon the merits of the bill, the point of order being reserved, and that then there may be such five-minute debate as may be apt and proper. In the meantime I would be glad to consult with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL], because I think, on fully considering this matter, he will see that some time or other before this Congress adjourns we must determine this question on its merits; and I think the present may be the best time to do it, both for the gentleman from Illinois in charge of the bill and for those of us who do not agree to this provision. I think I can satisfy the gentleman touching that matter.

Mr. BROMWELL. The proposition is, then, that to-morrow, immediately after the consideration of the bill is entered upon, there shall be an hour's debate on this section.

Mr. CANNON. An hour's general debate on each side.

Mr. BROMWELL. The point of order being reserved, to be brought forward again after the general debate, or waived?

Mr. CANNON. The point of order to come up afterwards, unless the gentleman from Ohio can see his way clear to think it politic to waive it and allow the matter to be decided on its merits, as I think he will when he fully considers the question. But in the meantime, for the present, let the point of order be reserved and let the matter go over till to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, when we go into Committee of the Whole; that then there be two hours' general debate on each side.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I suggest that the committee are unanimous in favor of the bill as it reads——

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And I do not see any reason why we should not go right on with this matter now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I suggest that there should be some arrangement about the control of the time.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BROMWELL. I believe I have the floor. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] is entitled to the floor, the point of order, as the Chair understands, being reserved.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing that this provision of the bill be passed over until to-morrow morning, to be taken up as soon as we go into Committee of the Whole, and I will agree to general debate for two hours, one hour to be controlled by my colleague [Mr. CANNON] and one hour by the acting chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that this paragraph be passed over until the meeting of the committee to-morrow, when it is to be considered, points of order to be reserved, and that general debate be had for two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and the other hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS], acting chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Depots for coal: To enable the Secretary of the Navy to execute the provisions of section 1552 of the Revised Statutes, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to establish, at such places as he may deem necessary, suitable depots for coal, and other fuel, for the supply of steamships of war, $700,000.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. As I understand, this is an appropriation that executes the section of the Revised Statutes referred to, and is available to the Secretary of the Navy to establish suitable depots for coal and other fuel anywhere that it is necessary to do so.

Mr. FOSS. That is true.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I want to ask the gentleman if he has had his attention called to a late Executive order that places the jurisdiction of the Dry Tortugas where the quarantine station now exists, under the Secretary of the Navy, for the purpose of establishing a coaling station there, which would necessarily discontinue the quarantine station at that point?

Mr. FOSS. I would state in reply to the question that my attention has not been called to it officially.

Mr. CANNON. Well, now, I want to say to the gentleman that mine has, within a day or two, and that to-morrow morning, as the sundry civil bill carries appropriations for the quarantine service, and there comes an application for a large amount of money to move this quarantine station somewhere else, I have caused a request to be made to the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury to give that committee a hearing at half past 10 to-morrow touching that mattter.

It is a matter of very great importance. The quarantine station at this point cost $175,000. It is the most important quarantine station on the Gulf coast. It is the nearest to Habana, it is the one that is relied upon to quarantine the commerce and the people that may be infected with and spread the yellow fever; and while I have not looked into it, yet I hope to between this and noon to-morrow, and I should be very glad indeed if some other coaling station could be arranged for. If it is not arranged for, I think that this appropriation ought to be amended so as to direct the use of the necessary part of it to construct quarantine stations elsewhere; and if it meets the approval of my friend——

Mr. FOSS. Why not let it go over?

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad if he would pass this over and recur to it later on in the bill.

Mr. FOSS. I agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the formal amendment withdrawn?

Mr. FOSS. I agree to pass over this provision until to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the paragraph will be passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

Equipment plant at Cavite, Philippine Islands: For the purchase of the necessary tools and appliances for the enlargement and for increasing the facilities of the equipment plant at Cavite, Philippine Islands, $30,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to direct the attention of the committee to this item. On the urgent deficiency bill, passed at this session, there was an item appropriating $30,000 for this same purpose. The Committee on Appropriations had jurisdiction of it purely as a deficiency item and had to investigate it as best we could.

We did investigate it, and were satisfied, in the present condition of the service in the Philippines, that the $30,000 ought to be appropriated, although I am frank to say that we were also satisfied that the improvements at Cavite should be only makeshift improvements; that the true point to improve was, I believe, Subig Bay; and if I recollect right, Admiral Dewey was very clearly of the opinion that Subig Bay was the place where the naval establishment ought to be, from every standpoint, both from the depth of water and otherwise. If I recollect aright, they said that at Cavite there was 19 feet of water only; at any rate it was quite shallow; but for present stress we recommended the $30,000.

I must confess, unless some light has come to the Committee on Naval Affairs, I should be inclined to doubt the propriety of making further improvements there, especially if we were correctly informed that the improvements ought to go where the deep water is and where the true place for defense is, namely, at Subig Bay; and it is merely for the purpose of drawing the attention of the gentleman to that matter and asking him this question that I have made these remarks. I disclaim any thorough knowledge about the premises.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest to my colleague that the $30,000 was left optional with the Secretary for the very reason that it is here left optional, as the water was not of sufficient depth. I think it ought to be left so here; even if you have to repeat the provision, you had better repeat it here also.

Mr. CANNON. I do not recollect what the provision was in the urgent deficiency bill. I would be glad if my colleague would send to the committee room and get that information.

Mr. FOSS. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to this provision. If he will note the provision, it is for the necessary tools and appliances for the enlargement and for increasing the facilities of the equipment plant at Cavite. If it is deemed desirable to change the location of the plant at some future time, then the tools and appliances can also be changed. Now, then, this is the only plant we have there. There are sixty to seventy vessels in those waters, and it is quite important that we should have this plant there, even for temporary purposes, because without this equipment plant our vessels have to go 700 miles away to Hongkong, and that was the explanation given by those in charge of the Bureau before the committee.

Mr. GAINES. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

Mr. DAYTON. I hope I may have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, while I read him the information that we had before the committee, and to be found in the hearing, a very late one, of Admiral Bradford, in charge of this Bureau.

I may say, further, that while the subject of the location of the naval station in the Philippines is under consideration, coal will always be required at Manila, that being the chief seaport of the archipelago, and after due consideration by the Department it was decided that it would be wise and advisable to prepare suitable storage for a considerable amount of coal there without reference as to whether a permanent naval station would be located there or at Subig Bay.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there a naval station at present?

Admiral BRADFORD. Yes, sir; at Cavite.

The CHAIRMAN. It was the Spanish naval station?

Admiral BRADFORD. Yes; a considerable station, too; there is a marine railway there.

The CHAIRMAN. Are we using it now?

Admiral BRADFORD. Yes; vessels up to 600 tons can be hauled up and are being hauled up constantly. It is proposed to locate this coal station about a third of a mile from Cavite, inside of Sanglai Point, where the Spanish had a coaling station.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. What is the depth of the water there?

Admiral BRADFORD. About 19 feet. There is a civil engineer there now boring and surveying for the location of the wharf and house.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Is there a wharf there now?

Admiral BRADFORD. Only the remains of one.

The CHAIRMAN. How do you coal there now?

Admiral BRADFORD. By means of lighters, or cascos, as they are called. When coal is taken there in merchant ships it is discharged into lighters; the natives carry the coal on shore and pile it in the open, using small baskets; when a ship is coaled the reverse operation takes place, the natives carrying the coal to the cascos, which are towed to the vessel of war and the coal is placed on board. Labor is cheap, and it costs from 50 to 60 cents in gold per ton to carry it ashore and back again to war ships.

Mr. DAYTON. Does this contemplate dredging the channel?

Admiral BRADFORD. No; only the erection of the necessary storehouses and wharves.

Mr. DAYTON. Do you think that depth of water—19 feet—will be sufficient?

Admiral BRADFORD. Well, a greater depth would be better, but most of the ships that will be on that station in the future will be small vessels and they can go to the wharf and coal. Larger vessels must be coaled by means of lighters, which go to the wharf to be filled.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Is that the mean depth of the harbor or at the pier?

Admiral BRADFORD. Only at the pier.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. How far out would you have to put the piers to get a greater depth?

Admiral BRADFORD. I can not tell you exactly, but it is too far to make the construction of a pier practicable. Large ships can coal perhaps more rapidly with a number of lighters than at the wharf. The wharf will facilitate coaling small vessels and will very much facilitate the discharge of colliers.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. How many tons of coal will you be liable to have there at a maximum time?

Admiral BRADFORD. I have had as much as 40,000 tons, and I should say there should be a supply of 25,000 tons at all times. I have been sometimes reduced below that; I am now, but there should be a good reserve always on hand.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Norfolk, Va.: Quay wall north of timber basin, $25,000; concrete and granite dry dock, to cost not more than $1,200,000, for which contract is hereby authorized, $200,000; remodeling machine shop for steam engineering, $60,000; extension of locomotive crane track, $15,000; increasing electric plant, $20,000; office building for steam engineering, $20,000; storehouse for yards and docks, $45,000; paving and grading, $30,000; garbage crematory, $5,000; stables, $7,500; surgeons' office and dispensary, $10,000; remodeling steam-fitters' and plumbers' shop for construction and repair, $15,000; new altars for timber dry dock, $15,000; laundry at St. Helena for receiving ship, $5,000; sewers, $4,000; in all, navy-yard, Norfolk, Va., $466,500.

Mr. CANNON. I notice that in this paragraph a dry dock to cost not more than $1,200,000 is authorized for the navy-yard at Norfolk. This is an entirely new work, as I understand—an additional dry dock.

Mr. FOSS. I call on the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY], who is a member of the committee, to give the gentleman from Illinois such information as he may require.

Mr. RIXEY. Yes, sir; this is a provision for a new dry dock.

Mr. CANNON. How many are there at that point now?

Mr. RIXEY. I understand there are two there now.

Mr. CANNON. Is either of them large enough to dock our large cruisers or battle ships?

Mr. RIXEY. I understand not; I understand that neither of the existing docks will take a first-class battle ship.

Mr. CANNON. It was stated a year or two ago that the river at that point was so narrow that it was not practicable to dock there a battle ship or a large cruiser in any dock that might be constructed. Has the gentleman any information on that point?

Mr. RIXEY. My information is that——

Mr. DAYTON. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] make a point of order?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all; I am merely trying to get some information.

Mr. RIXEY. My information is that there is ample depth of water there for a new dry dock, to dock any ship of any size that we have; and that provision has been made for dredging. I will state further that Admiral Endicott, as I am informed, stated that it is more important to have a new dry dock at Norfolk than at any other point.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The State riparian water line—the State line—was the basis for the remark the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] made just now concerning the width of the river. The trouble since then, I understand, has been settled. It was supposed several years ago that on account of so much traffic in that river such a dry dock as is now contemplated would hardly be desirable; but more land is now being taken in, and the riparian rights no longer stand in the way.

The largest of the docks there takes in vessels of the class of the New York. Those are the largest ships that can be docked there at present. The depth of water has been increased now to 28 feet.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Thirty feet at low water.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Thirty feet at low water, as the gentleman from New York informs me. It was formerly 22 feet; and at one time the New York had difficulty in reaching the dock on account of the shallowness of the water, and was sent back to the navy-yard at New York.

This new dock is considered to be absolutely necessary by Admiral Endicott, because it will occupy a middle position between Key West and our northern boundary. There is not now, and never has been, at that point any dock that would take in a first-class battle ship. One of the docks there now is a small dock, a granite dock, constructed nearly fifty years ago, and to-day it is nearly as good as new.

Mr. CANNON. The reason I asked the question was this: I have a very clear recollection that about the time of the breaking out of the late war with Spain, or a little later, there was some difficulty about docking ships even of the size of the New York; and there came a stress estimate by way of deficiency—that is about the only way that I get knowledge of naval appropriations—an estimate, if I recollect aright, of $100,000 to dredge the channel there, a work which was brought to our attention as absolutely necessary. I think I got my impression then that the river was so narrow at that point that probably there never could be constructed a dry dock that would give sufficient depth of water and that would be available to dock our great battle ships and cruisers.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I think the gentleman's impression came from this fact: It was thought it would be dangerous to launch a ship which might be built there——

Mr. CANNON. Possibly that was it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. No danger was apprehended about docking vessels. The apprehension was in regard to launching ships that might be built, as there was some trouble at that time with the Raleigh and the Texas, built at that yard.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. I should like a moment more to complete what I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the gentleman from Illinois will proceed for five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. RIXEY. In answer to the gentleman's question, may I read him what Admiral Endicott said?—

The Norfolk Navy-Yard has always been of the first importance, whether in time of peace or war.

* * * * * * *

The Bureau renews its recommendation of last year that Congress appropriate for the construction of a permanent dry dock of the largest size at this navy-yard. The reasons why such a dock is needed are set forth in the last annual report, and will not be repeated here. At the time that report was made steps had been taken by the War Department, under authority of Congress, to improve the navigation between the Chesapeake Bay and the navy-yard by excavating a channel of the depth of 30 feet at mean low water, in order that this navy-yard might be accessible to the largest naval vessels at all stages of the tide.

This channel is now completed, and it is regarded as exceedingly important that facilities be established at this yard for docking the largest vessels of the Navy. Hitherto it has not been possible for the deepest draft vessels to reach the yard at all times because the channel has not been deep enough. Congress has authorized the construction of a timber dry dock of the largest size at the League Island Navy-Yard, but no dock will exist south of that point of a capacity for receiving the largest naval vessels unless one be built at the Norfolk yard, which is only second in importance upon the Atlantic seaboard, and it should be immediately fitted for the heaviest work of the Navy in this respect.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, my object is not to criticise the work of the Naval Committee, where I have not had the opportunity of gathering much knowledge, but to elicit some information for my own guidance in this matter. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] reminds me that instead of the appropriation being $100,000 for the dredging of this channel at the breaking out of the Spanish war, it was $375,000. I do not recollect the exact amount, but the gentleman is most probably correct, as he usually is.

Now, I have no doubt that if we were beginning anew in the United States, touching our navy-yards—if the revolution that has been going on in shipbuilding from wood to iron and steel ships was new and now in progress, perhaps many of our yards would be differently located. Of course these are matters that we must gather by experience.

I know where several yards were located under the old order of things, and cities have grown up adjacent to them, and of course, under the circumstances, it would be very difficult to make a change. In fact, it is difficult, almost always, to change the location where the establishment has once been erected. But as we understand it, ours is a representative Government, and we all look out for our own interests while we look also to the interest of the public.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not desire, of course, to cut off the speech of my friend from Illinois, but I would like to have the privilege of knowing exactly what the question is before the House? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will state to my friend from Ohio that I am determined to strike out the last word, if I have strength enough to do it. [Laughter and applause.] I am anxious, and am now doing my very best in reference to that motion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well; I am satisfied. I am glad to know that something was pending before the committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. I trust the gentleman from Illinois will confine his remarks to the amendment suggested. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I will say in all kindness to my golden-haired colleague from Illinois that I am assured from his manner that he would agree to the amendment. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I will complete my remarks when we reach Mare Island. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval station, Port Royal, S. C.: Toward rebuilding dry dock, to cost not to exceed $500,000, $150,000, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to rebuild or repair said dock in concrete or stone, or both, as he may elect; condensing plant, $30,000; fire-engine house, $9,000; grading and drainage, $2,000; purchase of land, $20,000; crane supports in steam-engineering machine shop, $10,000; in all, naval station, Port Royal, $227,000.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. I wish to know whether or not the dock that has been built, repaired, and appropriated for, in connection with the paragraph just read, as well as the appropriations that have been made for procuring water at the docks, and the various sums that have been expended in connection with it, have given any manner of information on which we can base an opinion?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] will give the gentleman from Illinois full information upon that point.

Mr. CANNON. And, Mr. Chairman, for fear that my time shall expire before I get through asking questions, I desire further to ask what assurance has the Committee on Naval Affairs that after the building of a dry dock not to exceed $500,000, and for which $160,000 is appropriated—what assurance is there that, when in addition to what has been already expended, where it seems that there is not and has not been found heretofore a sufficient number of feet of water to enable ships to get out—what assurance is there that after this additional large sum is expended we will have a dock that we can get to without going over land? [Laughter.]

Mr. ELLIOTT. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois, I beg to say that it appears from the hearings before the committee that any ship of the Navy can go up to the Port Royal dry dock and remain there at all stages of the tide and go into the dock and come out without interruption. There is no difficulty, therefore, about the amount of water, if that is the point the gentleman from Illinois has in mind. What was the other question of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CANNON. I would like to know whether the gentleman has information that the expenditure of the amount here appropriated will give us a dock that can be used for our larger vessels?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is the information we received from the Navy Department—that it will rebuild the dock in accordance with the plan suggested by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CANNON. What has been expended heretofore at Port Royal dry dock?

Mr. ELLIOTT. About $2,000,000.

Mr. CANNON. How many ships have been docked there? I mean the larger war ships.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The first battle ship docked anywhere in the United States—the Indiana—was docked there. I do not remember of any other of the first-class war vessels being docked at Port Royal.

Mr. CANNON. Has there been one docked since the Indiana was docked?

Mr. ELLIOTT. As far as I know, no other battle ship.

Mr. CANNON. Was there not some trouble in connection with the docking of the Indiana? Was there not some fear that we might lose the vessel entirely while being docked there?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I can only say to the gentleman, as I said to him a year ago upon this same point, that the Indiana went in and came out, as the commandant of the station reported, as easily as a tugboat could have done.

Mr. CANNON. Then the newspaper and other statements were mere "fakes" about our probable loss of the vessel?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Either that or they were untrue statements, made by rival dock-building firms.

Mr. CANNON. And no battle ships have been docked there since, to the gentleman's knowledge?

Mr. ELLIOTT. No additional battle ships or cruisers have been docked since then, but other vessels have been. The harbor is an excellent one, and it is necessary to have these docks ready for our ships, so as to meet any emergency that might arise.

Mr. TALBERT. It seems to me that the naval officers have had something to say about this matter. It is not the amount of water or anything of that kind that enters into their calculations. That is not the trouble. The real difficulty is that it is not a good place to give balls or that kind of thing for the élite. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. I think I can give the gentleman some information. The dock is built of wood, in low soil. Hurricanes frequently sweep over that region. If you remember, we had to appropriate money several years ago for damages caused by a hurricane. This wooden dock is sprung; it leaks badly, and must be repaired.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is new, is it not?

Mr. CUMMINGS. It was completed about seven years ago. It requires extensive repairs. It has a concrete foundation. If it is to be repaired, it ought to be repaired with some other material than timber; and so it has been left in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to repair it in concrete or stone, or both, as he may choose.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last two words. I wish to read a line from the hearing:

NAVAL STATION, PORT ROYAL, S. C.

The CHAIRMAN. The next station is the naval station at Port Royal, S. C.; rebuilding dry dock, $500,000.

Mr. DAYTON. You can get along without the dock there, can you not?

Admiral ENDICOTT. Yes, sir; but something ought to be done with it some time or other, and as soon as possible; but I do not think the interests of the service will suffer in the absence of its use just at present.

Mr. DAYTON. Now, the next item is the quay wall, $50,000.

Admiral ENDICOTT. That quay wall is to make a good permanent water front. You know they have violent cyclones there, and every time one of those occur we have a good deal of damage done to the water front.

And so on.

I have no malice touching this amendment. I can not talk with as much certainty about this as I could about some of the other navy-yards: but with a great bill carrying $61,000,000 and authorizing $40,000,000 more—for that is what this bill does—appropriating $61,000,000 and authorizing forty millions more to be appropriated hereafter—I am satisfied that perhaps ten millions, and I do not know but twenty, might be dispensed with without hurting the service. I know that it is difficult to do this, for if we are all to represent our constituents, each is apt to think that he has the most important improvements that ought to be made.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, there is no dry dock, except the Port Royal dry dock, between Norfolk and New Orleans, a stretch of 1,600 miles. The New Orleans dock is not yet completed. It does seem to me that, in view of the fact that we have a dock already constructed at Port Royal that will take in battle ships of the largest size—a dock that is now leaking and falling to pieces, a dock that must be repaired to preserve it—it is economy, first-class economy, to repair it either in concrete or with stone. Believing this, I advocated this appropriation in the committee.

I believe that it is absolutely necessary to have some dock between the port of Norfolk and the port of New Orleans. You have had one made of timber at Pensacola, which went to ruin during the war. There is no other place, not even at Key West, nor at the Dry Tortugas, where a ship can be docked. In case of war the only place where we could dock a ship between Norfolk and New Orleans would be in the harbor of Havana, provided the Cubans would allow us to do so, and we obtain by purchase the steel dock left there by the Spaniards.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Mare Island, Cal.: Tools for yards and docks, $10,000; sewers, $10,000; sidewalks and roads, $15,000; water system, $107,000; enlarging freight shed, $5,000; medical dispensary, $7,500; light and power station, $50,000; shelter roof for construction and repair, $2,200; joiner shop for construction and repair, to cost not more than $100,000, for which contract is hereby authorized, $50,000; anchor shed, $7,000; to continue quay wall, $30,000; crane scow, $12,000; to continue dredging, $100,000; foundry for construction and repair, $4,500; pattern shop for construction and repair, $6,000; coal storage, $50,000; changes and extensions in electric system, $12,000; enlargement of equipment offices, building 65, $5,000; barracks for enlisted men (to take the place of the receivingship), to cost not more than $300,000, for which contract is hereby authorized, $100,000; in all, navy-yard, Mare Island, $563,200.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word. I notice in this appropriation an item of a hundred thousand dollars to continue dredging. As I understand, that is for the channel from San Francisco up to Mare Island.

Mr. FOSS. I should have to refer to the report in order to state that.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I want to say that this is another navy-yard that for many purposes is a dry-land navy-yard—the one at Mare Island.

There ought not ever to be another dollar expended. It ought to be abandoned, and a navy-yard constructed down on San Francisco Bay, where there is water sufficient to float battle ships and cruisers that the United States owns. I have had occasion time and again to look into the matter of the yard at Mare Island, and I think if it were to be located to-day it should not be located there at all.

Since it was located there great expensive quarters and a great expensive establishment of a navy-yard has been constructed, but the river has been inclined to fill up and you have to dredge it. It appears on the river and harbor bills to dredge out and improve the river, as I understand it.

Mr. LOUD. It is not a river at all.

Mr. CANNON. It is a bay, that leads up from San Francisco, and shoals and fills up, as I understand the condition.

Mr. LOUD. It is 25 miles wide.

Mr. CANNON. It is 25 miles wide, but it shoals and fills up. Now, a hurricane came along, and I think mercifully came along, a year or two ago and blew down a good many officers' quarters and buildings at Mare Island. If the people had done half as well as the Lord did, and not tried to build another building there, and built a navy-yard down on San Francisco Bay, we would have something to show for our money. I suppose it is not worth while to make a motion to strike out.

Mr. LOUD. Would not that same rule apply to all our navy-yards?

Mr. CANNON. No; it does not apply to New York; because there——

Mr. LOUD. What other navy-yard does it not apply to?

Mr. CANNON. It does not apply to New York and it does not apply to Boston.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Nor to Port Orchard.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says maybe it can apply to all. It may apply to some of them. I can not speak for all of them, but we have got a good many bad navy-yards that would not exist for a holy minute if it was not for the "you tickle me and I tickle you"—and I am not abusing anybody. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. Let me ask you right there if the city of Boston is not coming here year after year, and at the present time, after a very large appropriation to give them water enough to enable them to get up to the navy-yard at Charlestown, and that we are spending three or four million dollars in the harbor of New York to give vessels an opportunity to get up there?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; but New York is a great harbor that takes a large part of the commerce of the world, and so is Boston a great harbor that takes a large portion of the commerce of the world. So is San Francisco Bay, and God gave you one of the most beautiful bays on earth, where you have got water. Why do you want to go up 25 miles, where the water shoals, and maintain a navy-yard? The gentleman lives in that neck of the woods down there. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. Water!

Mr. CANNON. Neck of the woods is the correct expression. But he has got real water in San Francisco Bay. Now, I do not suppose that this will do any good, because I suppose the combination will still hold, and I speak of it respectfully; I am not abusing any of them, but I wish that by some way or other we could manage these navy-yards in the public interest, and would be glad to vote three or four million dollars to every locality that has a navy-yard that the Government does not need if we could just discontinue the navy-yards that we do not need and improve navy-yards that the Government does need.

Mr. LOUD. I only wanted you to be historically correct. That is all I was after.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I do not happen to represent that "neck of the woods," but I am quite familiar with San Francisco Bay. I was all over it last fall with the charts. There is not an available point at the present in San Francisco Bay. There was a year or two ago, at Hunters Point, but that is no longer available.

Mr. CANNON. Can not we condemn it?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. There is not a dry dock——

Mr. CANNON. No.

Mr. FOSS. We have spent four or five million dollars at this place.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. It is possible, but it is questionable whether there is ground enough at Hunters Point for the accommodation of a navy-yard. Now, there has been a great deal of money expended at Mare Island in the construction of workshops, and under the conditions that exist at present in and about San Francisco it is unquestionably the best point.

Mr. McRAE. Do I understand the gentleman from Missouri to make the motion to strike out the appropriation for $100,000 for dredging?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman simply moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. McRAE. I move to strike out the appropriation—that is, "continuing dredging, $100,000," in lines 15 and 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MAHON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. BENNETT, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 4024. An act directing the Secretary of the Treasury to re-examine and resettle the accounts of certain States and the city of Baltimore growing out of the moneys expended by said States and the city of Baltimore for military purposes during the war of 1812;

S. 4215. An act granting a pension to Belle Bean;

S. 743. An act to relieve Benjamin F. Burgess of the charge of desertion; and

S. R. 31. Joint resolution to authorize the appointment of George Izard Middleton an ensign in the Navy.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and concurrent resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 8466. An act to amend an act entitled "An act in relation to taxes and tax sales in the District of Columbia;"

H. R. 6959. An act to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases," approved January 5, 1893;

H. R. 5485. An act providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof; and

S. Con. Res. No. 45:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be directed to cause a survey to be made and an estimate submitted of the cost of dredging and otherwise improving the mouth of the Nooksack River, to the end that during freshets the water of said river may be enabled to pass freely into the waters of Puget Sound without overflowing the surrounding country. Should a further examination prove that it is not practicable to remove the accumulated débris from the mouth of said river, the Secretary of War is hereby directed to submit estimates of the cost of opening a new channel for the mouth of said river.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 31, lines 15 and 16, strike out the words "To continue dredging, $100,000."

Mr. McRAE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I know nothing about whether this is a proper place for a navy-yard, but this is not a river and harbor bill, and this item is a river and harbor item. There are projects throughout this country that need appropriations, and I object to making the naval appropriation bill the means of improving harbors at some place where there may happen to be some Government property, to the exclusion of all other rivers and harbors. I hope the item will be stricken out.

If I had known before the paragraph was passed, I would have made a point of order against it, but it escaped my notice. I insist that this is not the proper place to make an appropriation for improvement of rivers and harbors, however worthy they may be.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in reference to this item that it was recommended by the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and I will read you what he says in regard to it.

Under appropriations previously made contracts were entered into for dredging a basin in front of the yard sufficiently deep to allow the larger vessels to lie afloat at low tide, and to excavate a channel of the proper depth through Mare Island straits. This work has been carried on for about eighteen months, and has resulted in greatly improving navigation at and in the vicinity of the yard, but further work is necessary in order to give the anchorage ground sufficient width for the convenient mooring of vessels and the channels ample width for navigation. A further appropriation of $100,000 is recommended for continuing the improvement.

So I understand it is a fact that the purpose is to get sufficient anchorage there, and it is to excavate the channel.

Mr. McRAE. Who made that recommendation?

Mr. FOSS. The Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks in his report made that recommendation.

Mr. McRAE. He is a naval officer?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. McRAE. Now, the testimony offered by the gentleman himself shows that the improvement is to be made for improving the navigation and deepening the channel, and while it may be necessary, this is not a proper place to do it. It should be in a river and harbor bill; and if we can not have that bill at this session for the country at large, it seems to me that all these appropriations that seek to make improvements of rivers and harbors ought to go out and wait for the bill next session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, just one word. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas will not insist on this motion, when he takes into consideration that this is substantially the only navy-yard we have on the Pacific coast that is available. I am aware of the fact that we have a dry dock at Puget Sound, where we have ample facilities and where the channel is amply deep. But he must remember that a large amount of the repair work of the Navy will necessarily come to this yard at Mare Island. He must also recognize the further fact that no matter what mistake may have been made in the past in locating the yard at its present place, it has nevertheless been located there, and a million dollars of Government money is invested there, and that this hundred thousand dollars will render that channel in such a condition that it will go largely toward rendering this an efficient navy-yard.

I have not the figures before me, but my recollection is that the report indicates that this yard stands possibly fourth in this country in the amount of repair work that is done. That is an important consideration on the Pacific coast and now requires attention, because of the fact that our ships will come there for repairs from the Philippine Islands. Under these circumstances, remembering further that we have already expended a large sum in this way to continue this dredging, that the work is going on under the direction of this Bureau, it seems to me that we had better not stop it now, but appropriate the money for the work to continue. I admit that the objection is technically correct; that the item ought to come up in the river and harbor bill; but at the same time this channel and this work is very much needed for the benefit of the Government yard located there.

I regret exceedingly that sickness has prevented the member from California [Mr. METCALF] on the Naval Committee from being present this afternoon, and I want to make this statement to the committee to explain the reason why he does not rise to defend this appropriation.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. RIDGELY. Can the gentleman tell us how much has been expended in dredging this channel altogether?

Mr. DAYTON. I am not able to tell you now. My recollection is that a similar sum—I do not state this accurately—that a similar sum of $100,000 was appropriated last year. At any rate, there was a very considerable sum appropriated last year for this work, and this is to continue it.

Mr. McRAE. Will this finish it?

Mr. DAYTON. I am not able to state that definitely; it will go largely toward it.

Mr. RIDGELY. The gentleman can not tell whether we shall have to keep on appropriating for this purpose or not?

Mr. DAYTON. The channel has been largely improved and bettered by the appropriations that have been made heretofore. It has been deepened so that a much better class of vessels can enter the harbor. My judgment is that $100,000 will complete the work, but I do not make that statement absolutely.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment, in view of what the gentleman from West Virginia says.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Dredging, Dry Tortugas, Florida: Dredging channel, $100,000.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against so much of the paragraph as provides for dredging at Dry Tortugas. If there is any explanation to be given, I am willing to reserve the point of order to hear it. I do not see any purpose indicated, and I know it is an item that ought to be on the river and harbor bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is reserved.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas, while the gentleman from Illinois is looking up the record, that I dare say the appropriation of $100,000 for dredging Dry Tortugas is probably an expenditure already begun or otherwise relating to the destruction of the quarantine station; and I would suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas and the gentleman from Illinois that we pass this paragraph and return to it at a later time.

Mr. McRAE. I am perfectly willing to that, if the point is reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the paragraph will be passed and the point of order reserved.

There was no objection.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Dry dock, Algiers, La.: To complete floating dry dock for Algiers, La., $650,000.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I have just received a letter from the Secretary of the Navy asking that $300,000 of this may be made immediately available, so that I offer the following amendment. After line 13 I move to insert "$300,000 to be immediately available."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 13, page 33, insert "$300,000 to be immediately available."

Mr. DAYTON. I would like to ask the chairman in charge of the bill what is the practical difference if we make the whole of this sum immediately available? I make the statement that the contractors building this dock have already expended upon the work a very much larger sum than the appropriation already made will meet.

The dock is being rapidly pushed forward. I had the pleasure a very short time ago of examining the work which had been done upon it, and it seems to me that the sooner it is completed the better. A part of this appropriation, under the terms of the amendment, will be available in July; and a further amendment providing simply that the whole sum be immediateiy available will enable this work to be prosecuted very expeditiously so as to be completed much sooner than would otherwise be the case. I suggest an amendment making the whole sum immediately available.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of the proposed amendment the words "three hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. FOSS. I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] as modified by him upon the suggestion of the gentleman from West Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Building and grounds, Naval Academy: For the construction at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., of a building suitable for use as cadets' quarters, at a cost not to exceed $2,500,000, including the architect's fees and the pay of the clerk of the works and the inspectors, $350,000.

Mr. CANNON. I make a point of order on this paragraph. It contemplates an expenditure not authorized by existing law. All the money for this work up to the limit authorized by law has been appropriated.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. This same point precisely was raised against a precisely similar provision in the naval bills of the last two sessions of Congress, and the point was decided adversely. My recollection is that in the last Congress, at the second session, an amendment ment was offered by myself to insert a provision, not in the bill as it came from the committee, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to contract for the building of a power house, boathouse, and an armory—a provision precisely similar, I say, to that now before the Committee of the Whole, except that the amount was not the same.

The point of order was raised by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. BOUTELLE]; and I believe the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] who makes the present point of order submitted some observations in favor of that point, or it may be that the gentleman from Illinois himself made the point of order, and the gentleman from Maine supported it; I am not altogether clear in my recollection as to that. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole at that time, Mr. SHERMAN of New York being in the chair, decided that inasmuch as these works, though not specifically authorized by previous provision of law, were, in the language of the rule, "in continuation of appropriations for public works and objects already in progress," the point of order was not sustainable.

I am rather surprised that the same point should be made again this year. Everybody understands that we have a Naval Academy. I suppose all admit that we have a Navy and a general naval establishment, and both are within the purview and contemplation of law; and certainly it will not be seriously contended that every provision for every single building which we propose to provide for, either at the Naval Academy or anywhere else under the Navy Department, must be subject to this continual and perennial point of order.

I hardly think that it is necessary for me to argue this question further. There is no way under the sun by which we can provide for these buildings except in a general appropriation bill. There is no method known to me or, I apprehend, to the gentleman from Illinois by which it can be done unless in the manner proposed here and in the manner in which it has been done from time immemorial—upon appropriation bills in the Naval Committee.

Similar points of order have been made against provisions for buildings for the Naval War College; also against other buildings, although I can not give the exact citations now. But similar points of order have been made against buildings for the Military Academy at West Point, in which case the provisions were in all respects analogous to this, authorizing contracts to be made for a certain amount and making an appropriation for the same.

An amendment was submitted, as I have stated, in the last Congress for new buildings at Annapolis, Md., the appropriations amounting to $500,000. The matter will be found reported on page 3397 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the second session, I believe, of the last Congress. In ruling upon this question, the Chairman recited various precedents bearing upon the subject and overruled the point of order. And such have been the rulings of the Chair all along—unvaryingly—upon provisions similar to this.

Mr. CANNON. I hold in my hand the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and I read from it:

The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to contract for the construction, at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., of a building suitable for use as an armory, at a cost not to exceed $300,000; a boathouse, at a cost not to exceed $30,000; a power house, at a cost not to exceed $100,000; four double houses for officers' quarters, at a cost not to exceed $60,000; for grading, electric-light wiring, removing old buildings, and preparing plans, at a cost not to exceed $90,000; for construc'ing the line of sea wall on the river side, piling, dredging, and filling in, as may be necessary, $150,000; and the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated toward the construction of the public works herein authorized.

These public works, authorized by that provision of the law, aggregate $1,000,000.

Now, I will read another authorization, the act for the current year. It is as follows:

BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS AT THE NAVAL ACADEMY, ANNAPOLIS, MD.

For completion of buildings and other works authorized under the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, under such plans as may be adopted by the Secretary of the Navy, not to exceed in cost $1,220,000, $720,000.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, that $720,000 specified in this appropriation was appropriated plus the $500,000 that was appropriated in the general act previously passed, making a total appropriation of $1,220,000 for this purpose. And the last act provides specifically that this work shall not exceed in cost the sum of $1,220,000.

That is all the legislation that has been had about the Naval Academy on this subject. That is the law, and a limit has been placed on the cost, amounting to the sum I have suggested. The limit is fixed by law for these public works and buildings at the Academy, that they shall cost not to exceed the sum of $1,220,000.

Now, what is the provision before us? I read from the paragraph of the bill:

Building and grounds, Naval Academy: For the construction at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., of a building suitable for use as cadets' quarters, at a cost not to exceed $2,500,000, including the architect's fees and the pay of the clerk of the works and the inspectors, $350,000.

That, Mr. Chairman, is entirely without warrant of law. If that is in order on this bill it is equally in order to appropriate a hundred million for this, or for any other purpose, or for any character of work covered by the bill. I do not think it is in order to do this, for if it is it would be in order to increase the limit to two and one-half millions of dollars on the same ground, or to any sum. If that be true, then it would be in order to add something else, as is provided further on in the bill, and you may increase the appropriation to $100,000, $1,000,000, or $5,000,000. Where would be the limit?

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is of course competent for Congress to do all of these things, but it must do it under the rules of the House and by appropriate legislation. The legislation heretofore provides that this shall not cost to exceed $1,220,000. That is the law; the money has been appropriated, and it is beyond our power to extend that limit without a legal authorization in that direction. The extension, therefore, of the limit proposed here of two and a half million of dollars is subject to the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. Was not the gentleman arguing this morning on another proposition of the bill exactly to the contrary of the position he now takes?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. In my opinion he was. I understood you to argue that when we were authorized to extend anything the law providing for that expenditure might be changed——

Mr. CANNON (interrupting). Oh, Mr. Chairman, I am not responsible for my friend's misapprehensions or misunderstandings. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. But you are responsible for a change in your own views. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CANNON. I have not changed my position or my views. My friend thinks I have, but he will find that I am consistent in that regard.

Mr. KITCHIN. I only call attention to the change in the gentleman's argument from that made this morning to the one he is now making.

Mr. CANNON. The argument this morning, the gentleman will find, is not inconsistent with that I am making now. There is a naval establishment in existence. We appropriated for that. We appropriated for it in accordance with law. But here is a proposition to erect a certain public building, or public buildings, covered by authorization already made, and make a provision by legislation that will cost $2,500,000, whereas the legislation originally provided contemplated an expenditure of but $1,220,000.

That was done in express terms. Where, then, is the inconsistency? If it is in order to do this you can make it $50,000,000. If it is in order to do this you can make a naval school at Philadelphia, or at Long Branch, or anywhere else, upon an appropriation bill. We can do it by legislation, I admit, but the point is that it is legislation, and hence not in order here; and the appropriation following the legislation is not authorized by law, and hence it is subject to the point of order under the rule.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman think if the words were added "at the disposal or discretion of the President" it would meet his objection? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I would only say, Mr. Chairman, that I trust that God in His infinite wisdom and mercy may give my friend capacity to distinguish between one subject and another. I can not do it for him, I confess. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that God in His mercy has endowed me at least with the ability and capacity to observe the somersault of the gentleman from Illinois in one day. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Very well; we are even now.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the point of order. I think the gentleman reverses his argument absolutely. He stated to-day that the emergency fund was in order and the point of order was not good against it, because we now had provisions for the "maintenance of the Navy." That being the case, it was our duty to maintain it under the law, and hence it was proper to put an appropriation in the bill of $500,000 to be used, in the discretion of the President, wherever in the wide world he wanted to use it. That was the gentleman's point this morning. He said that it was not new legislation, although he could find no law to rest it upon.

Now, this afternoon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] takes this position: That although we have a Naval Academy to be maintained, to be built up, to be perfected; although we have all that and a law for it, yet, when in this bill we say "Erect a certain building there," lo and behold, the point of order is good against us. And so I reiterate my statement that I think I have observed a somersault on the part of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I did not agree with the argument made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] this morning, because there was no specific object for which the appropriation was made; but here there is a clear and specific object, a building to be erected and now in course of erection, and this body as far back as the Fiftieth Congress directly decided the point. A section of the bill was read providing for the erection of a fireproof building on the grounds of the Military Academy at West Point.

Mr. Kilgore, of Texas, made the point of order that the building had not been authorized by law.

After debate, the Chairman, Mr. Cox, of New York, ruled as follows:

The Chair decides that within the meaning of the provision just read the building proposed to be erected—"fireproof building on site of public grounds at West Point"—is within the purview of the rule. The construction of a building is an incident to the maintenance of the Academy itself, the object being already in progress—the main object contemplated not only by the bill, but by the very institution of the Academy itself.

Now, in the case of this decision, there was no building commenced. It was held that the appropriation was in order, to maintain the Academy. Here we have a building already provided for that this appropriation merely intends to enlarge. Now, I contend, Mr. Chairman, that in this instance, as well as in the proposition for the erection of an armor-plate factory that will be reached later in the bill, it is clearly in the line of all the decisions that have been rendered by the Chair in the last twenty years, that where an appropriation is for the purpose of maintaining the naval establishment that the erection of a new building at Annapolis, or the erection of any building that is necessary to carry out and maintain that establishment, is in order and not subject to the point of order.

I say this because the question may be raised later on in the bill when the proposition to build an armor-plate factory is up; but I also say it because last year I voted for the proposition to erect these buildings at Annapolis. There is not a man on this floor who has not got a young man from his district there who is being educated at the cost of the Government, for the benefit of the country. The buildings that we have had at Annapolis have been old structures that have been condemned and reported as dangerous to the life of those students there, and I say that when we take these young men from our districts and send them to Annapolis it is the duty of this Congress to provide that they shall have suitable quarters in which they may live during the four years that they are there.

Mr. MUDD. Just a word further on this point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to know, more than anything else, about the legislation referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman from Illinois raises any point that if this was an original proposition to erect a building there, without regard to the limit of cost, a point of order would be good against it. The Chair understands the gentleman to claim that since the ruling made in March, 1898, Congress has passed one or more laws by which it has limited the amount to be expended upon these buildings, and has appropriated that amount, and that this proposed appropriation would increase the limit, and is therefore not in accordance with existing law. That is what the Chair understands the gentleman to claim.

Mr. CANNON. That is my understanding of the condition.

Mr. MUDD. Your understanding is wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the question the Chair would like to be informed about.

Mr. CANNON. It is my understanding of the situation, although I will say that I do not understand that any ruling is right, if it was ever made, by which you can build, without legislation, a second library building, for instance, or a Supreme Court building upon this reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, Mr. Cox, in 1892, decided that on an appropriation bill it was in order to make an appropriation to build a new building at West Point for the use of the Academy, and following that decision, Mr. SHERMAN of New York decided, in March, 1898, that it was in order on an appropriation bill to authorize and appropriate for a new building at Annapolis for the purposes of the Naval Academy.

Mr. CANNON. I would say now, in reply to that, that in my judgment the decision of Mr. Cox, followed by that of Mr. SHERMAN, was not well taken. The repair of a building, as I understand, does not conflict with the rule; but the building of an entirely new building, in my judgment, does conflict with the rule. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] reminds me that the other day, in the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, an appropriation was made for a laboratory on the reservation adjacent to the Agricultural Department, and that it was held, subject to the rule, that there was no legislation that authorized it.

With all due respect to all decisions that may have been made, I do not believe that it was contemplated that you could authorize cadet quarters, to cost two million and a half, upon a general appropriation bill unless there was prior legislation. Now, that is just what this bill does, and so far as there is prior legislation, the limit of cost is fixed at a million two hundred thousand dollars, all of which has been appropriated.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask him, if this point of order shall be determined against, if the Post-Office Committee would have the right to report an appropriation for the erection of public buildings, especially if they were upon Government grounds?

Mr. CANNON. In connection with the postal service?

Mr. LOUD. Necessarily.

Mr. CANNON. I see no reason why they should not.

Mr. LOUD. If this thing is going around, I would like my committee to have some of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MUDD. Just a word. I am glad—in fact, I am much encouraged—when the gentleman from Illinois admits that in order to sustain his point of order it will be necessary for the Chair to reverse the decisions of former Chairmen for the last twenty or thirty years.

Mr. CANNON. I have not admitted it.

The CHAIRMAN. The decisions are not uniform by any means.

Mr. MUDD. Well, I want to correct the statement of the gentleman from Illinois in this respect. He stated that he understood that the act of the last session of Congress placed a limit on the buildings to be constructed at the Naval Academy. Now, the gentleman from Illinois obviously is mistaken. I have the provision of the last session of the last Congress now before me. It was offered by myself as an amendment to the naval appropriation bill, and it is as follows:

> For completion of buildings and other works authorized under the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, under such plans as may be adopted by the Secretary of the Navy, not to exceed in cost $1,220,000, $720,000.

The limit, and the only limit, in that provision was upon the specific buildings that had been theretofore authorized by an act of the preceding session, in an appropriation bill of that session, and the point of order now made presents a case which is similar to the situation which existed when the original appropriation was passed at the second session of the last Congress, making an appropriation of $500,000 for the construction of these buildings, which was then a new proposition for the three buildings, including the armory, the boathouse, and the power house.

The provision of that time, which I apprehend the Chair has now before him, was for $500,000 toward the construction of these three buildings which were then authorized. They had never theretofore been authorized by any provision of law. I apprehend there is no difference in principle on a point of order between a boathouse and armory and cadets' quarters, where the the cadets live and perform their work and receive their training.

If it was in order without a provision of a previous law to build a boathouse or a power house, as it was held by the then Chairman, Mr. SHERMAN, in pursuance of authority which guided him and had guided Mr. Cox in a decision there cited, and had guided other Chairmen for years and years before, I apprehend it is just as much in order to provide as a new and original proposition for the purpose of carrying on necessary "works and objects already in progress" at the Naval Academy in building cadet quarters.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him, as a question of fact, are there any cadet quarters there at Annapolis?

Mr. MUDD. There is a building which a board of survey and Boards of Visitors and the Secretary of the Navy have told us in official communications are liable at any day to fall down upon the heads of the cadets. They say they fear they may tumble down at any time.

But that is a matter that is not pertinent upon the discussion of the point of order. When we come to the merits of the proposition I think the House will agree, as they agreed on one or two occasions before, that these cadets ought to be kept in somewhat better houses down there than the gentleman from Illinois would keep his horse in at home. That is a matter, however, I repeat, that goes to the merits of the proposition, and not to the point of order.

Mr. DENNY. I would like to call my colleague's attention to the statement made in the testimony before the committee, on page 61, by Professor Dodge. The chairman asked him:

> Are there any other buildings which had been condemned and torn down? Professor DODGE. The cadets' quarters have been condemned by the board which examined it. It is very old and is rapidly going to pieces.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, nobody denies that the provision for the building of a dry dock or a navy-yard is not in order. It seems to me that if that is so, the proposition to build in the Naval Academy quarters for cadets to take the place of buildings which have been condemned as unhealthy and as unsafe would come within the same category of building a dry dock.

Mr. MUDD. I have here the original law which established the Naval Academy. It is section 1511 of the Revised Statutes. It provides as follows:

> A naval academy shall be established at Annapolis, in the State of Maryland.

I apprehend that it will not be seriously contended that the establishment of a naval academy did not require some "buildings" for the cadets. It is not to be supposed that the contemplation of law was they should rest in tents or on the ground uncovered by roof.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that he would like to examine some authorities not fully reported in the Digest before deciding this question. If there is no objection, he would like to have it go over at present.

Mr. FOSS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House bill 10450 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. GAMBLE, for ten days, on account of important business.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The time remaining before the 1st day of May, when the act of April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," will take effect, appears to be insufficient for the careful inquiry and consideration requisite to the proper selection of suitable persons to fill the important civil offices provided for by the act. The powers of the present government will cease when the act takes effect, and some new authority will be necessary to enable the officers now performing the various duties of civil government in the island to continue the performance of those duties until the officers who are to perform similar duties under the new government shall have been appointed and qualified.

That authority can not well be given at present by temporary appointments of the existing officers to positions under the act, for the reason that many of the existing officers are officers of the Army detailed to the performance of civil duties, and section 1222 of the Revised Statutes would prevent them from accepting such temporary appointments under the penalty of losing their commissions. The selection of the new officers and the organization of the new government under the act referred to will be accomplished with all practicable speed, but in order that it may be properly accomplished, I recommend the passage of a joint resolution to obviate the difficulty above stated.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 18, 1900.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 1569. An act granting a pension to Phebe E. C. Priestly—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 3708. An act granting a pension to John H. Harrison—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 3922. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary Corinne Blandin—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 2400. An act granting an increase of pension to Edith Lockwood Sturdy—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 1975. An act granting an increase of pension to Annie D. M. Wood—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 3534. An act granting an increase of pension to Helen G. Heiner—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4024. An act directing the Secretary of the Treasury to reexamine and resettle the accounts of certain States and the city of Baltimore growing out of the moneys expended by said States and the city of Baltimore for military purposes during the war of 1812—to the Committee on War Claims.

S. 4215. An act granting a pension to Belle Bean—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 743. An act to relieve Benjamin F. Burgess of the charge of desertion—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. R. 31. Joint resolution to authorize the appointment of George Izard Middleton an ensign in the Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Senate concurrent resolution 45:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be directed to cause a survey to be made and an estimate submitted of the cost of dredging and otherwise improving the mouth of the Nooksack River to the end that during freshets the water of said river may be enabled to pass freely into the waters of Puget Sound without overflowing the surrounding country. Should a further examination prove that it is not practicable to remove the accumulated débris from the mouth of said river, the Secretary of War is hereby directed to submit estimates of the cost of opening a new channel for the mouth of said river—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

FREE HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Thursday, May 3, be set aside for the consideration of House bill 996, known as the "free-homestead bill."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that May 3 be set down as a special order to consider the free-homestead bill. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Not to interfere with appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that there be added to that request that it shall not interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. McRAE. In view of the exception, what would be the objection to making it a continuing order?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

NAVAJO INDIAN RESERVATION, ARIZ.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on House bill 4001, authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on the Navajo Indian Reservation, Territory of Arizona.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4001) authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on the Navajo Indian Reservation, Territory of Arizona, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of the Senate amendment strike out all after the word "Provided" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That all that portion of the Navajo Indian Reservation in Arizona lying north of 36° 30′ north latitude and west of the one hundred and eleventh meridian be, and the same is hereby, opened for mining purposes only and subjected to the mining laws of the United States."

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN F. LACEY,
JOHN H. STEPHENS,
CHARLES CURTIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

WILLIAM M. STEWART,
GEORGE L. SHOUP,
JOHN L. McLAURIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. LACEY. The statement is very brief, Mr. Speaker, and will explain the effect of the amendment. I ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement of the conferees.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

The effect of the amendment as substituted by the conference report is to permit mining upon the land north of 36° 30′ north latitude and west of the one hundred and eleventh meridian. There are several mining claims that have been located on this portion of the Navajo Reservation, and indications are that the claims are valuable for copper.

This portion of the reservation is of very little value for grazing purposes, it being covered with lava beds, and it is of no advantage to the Indians to exclude miners therefrom. If the mines prove valuable, it is important that they should be opened. The necessities for increased supply of copper are national in character, and the reservation ought not, in the opinion of the conference committee, be used to prevent mining thereon.

In January, 1900, an Executive order was issued adding a large area of grazing land to the Navajo Reservation, so that with the amount of land obtained by this order the Indians will have larger and more valuable grazing facilities than they ever had before, and the opening of the lava-bed country to miners will not interfere with the occupation of the reservation for grazing purposes.

Mr. LACEY. I move that the report of the committee of conference be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the urgent deficiency bill with Senate amendments, and to recommend that certain of those amendments, as stated in the report which I send to the desk, be concurred in and certain other amendments concurred in with an amendment. I ask that the report be read, and then I desire unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of these amendments.

The report of the Committee on Appropriations was read, as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 10449, making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes, beg leave to submit the following report, and recommend that the House agree to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8.

That the House agree to amendments numbered 2 and 3 with amendments as follows:

Add to each of said amendments the following:

"Except in so far as such printing may be necessary in executing the requirements of the act to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes, approved March 14, 1900."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments, which were respectively concurred in, or concurred in with amendments, as recommended in the report of the committee.

GARFIELD HOSPITAL.

Mr. CANNON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back with a favorable recommendation the joint resolution (S. R. 114) for the relief of Garfield Hospital, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That $1,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated and out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, in equal parts, for the maintenance of the isolating ward for minor contagious diseases at Garfield Memorial Hospital for the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman explain the necessity for this appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. The sum of $3,000 was appropriated for the maintenance of the isolation ward at Garfield Hospital. That appropriation has been exhausted, and the ward has to be closed unless this further appropriation of $1,000 be made. This ward is for the treatment of cases like diphtheria, scarlet fever, measles, smallpox, etc.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Is this institution supported entirely by the District of Columbia?

Mr. CANNON. Very largely—not entirely. It has been so supported for years.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Is the institution conducted under private auspices?

Mr. CANNON. It is a private corporation.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. What is the nature of this private corporation?

Mr. CANNON. It is a corporation for the purpose of running the Garfield Hospital. Patients who can pay do so, and those who can not do not pay. Not only is this appropriation made, but there is a considerable appropriation for charity patients, etc.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I merely made the inquiry to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the institution is a private one. Certain gentlemen in this and other Congresses have been in the habit of going into hysterics when any appropriation is suggested where the adherents of the Catholic faith are to be the beneficiaries, but are silent or acquiescent when the adherents of the other churches are the beneficiaries. This institution is sectarian, just as much as certain other institutions which have been legislated against because the doctrines taught there were those of the Catholic faith. I will not object, however.

I am too broad minded on matters of this kind; and I think this is due as much as anything else to the liberal and progressive manner in which the Catholic Church teaches all her adherents to act on all matters which are for the general good. This hospital, although private, and, as I understand it, under the control of a certain religious denomination, is doing good work, and I shall certainly not offer any objection to unanimous consent being given for the present consideration of this bill. My rising at this time was merely to suggest to certain gentlemen who are present and who entertain narrow views when a certain religious denomination is concerned that this would be a good time to emphasize the peculiar ideas which they possess on the question of appropriations outside of regular governmental channels.

Mr. CANNON. The Garfield Hospital and the Providence Hospital have journeyed along on the sundry civil bill, in the main, fairly well; the controversies have usually come upon the District of Columbia bill. So that, upon the whole, I do not know that we can do better than to make the appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, it was passed.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote in both of the cases just considered by the House, and move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. H. L. OVERSTREET, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 114) for relief of Garfield Hospital.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4001) authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on the Navajo Indian Reservation, Territory of Arizona.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 5485) providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof; and

A bill (H. R. 8466) to amend an act entitled "An act in relation to taxes and tax sales in the District of Columbia."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PLATT of New York presented a petition of the National Confectioners' Association of New York City, praying for the passage of the so-called pure-food bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Edwin G. Garwood and 32 other citizens of Moorestown, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation which shall assure to the people of the Philippine Islands that it is not the purpose of the United States to force them to become subjects or citizens of the United States, but to assist them to establish and maintain an independent constitutional government, pending the establishment of which the United States will perform the international duties assumed by this Government, under the late treaty with Spain, in protecting the rights and securing the safety of the citizens and subjects of other countries in the Philippine Islands, as well as of those of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

TAX REGULATIONS IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. FORAKER. I present a paper, being a translation made in the division of customs and insular affairs, War Department, April, 1900, on the regulations for the levying, administration, and collection of the industrial and commercial taxes in Porto Rico, promulgated by royal decree of June 9, 1893. I move that the paper be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OF PORTO RICO.

Mr. FORAKER. I am instructed by the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 116) to provide for the administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico pending the appointment and qualification of the civil officers provided for in the act approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," to report it favorably without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. TELLER. I wish to have the joint resolution printed so that we may have a chance to see it.

Mr. FORAKER. It has been printed, but the Senator perhaps has not had a chance to see it. I think if he will look at it in a moment——

Mr. TELLER. I have not had any opportunity to look at it; that is certain.

Mr. FORAKER. That is true, probably.

Mr. TELLER. I hope the Senator will withhold it until after the routine morning business, at least.

Mr. FORAKER. Very well; I will delay it until that time.

Mr. TELLER. I shall not object to its consideration then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is withdrawn for the present.

Mr. FORAKER. I will be glad if the Senator will look at it, so that it can be acted on at the session to-day.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to object to taking it up after I read it, but I desire to have it laid aside for the present.

REVENUE CUTTER FOR USE AT PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. PENROSE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4197) to provide for the construction of a revenue cutter for use at Philadelphia, Pa., to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The bill was read; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to have constructed, or purchase, at a cost not to exceed $50,000, a vessel to be used and equipped as a revenue cutter of the third class for harbor service at Philadelphia, Pa.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALLOWANCE OF EXCEPTIONS.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back favorably with an amendment the bill (H. R. 8366) to amend section 953 of the Revised Statutes, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. President, before the bill is read, I desire to say to the Senate that a similar bill passed the Senate the other day without any question. It is a bill which provides that when a judge dies who has sat in a trial before the exceptions are signed, the successor of the judge shall pass upon the exceptions.

The House have sent up a bill similar to the one passed by the Senate except that they have added a clause that if the judge is unable to pass intelligently on the exceptions there shall be in all cases a new trial. Our committee thought it was going too far, and therefore I desire the Senate to pass the bill with an amendment striking out the House addition, and if the House insists on a disagreement to the Senate amendment there will be a conference. That is the whole bill. Let the Secretary read it.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 2, to strike out lines 11 to 15, inclusive, in the following words:

But in case said judge is satisfied that owing to the fact that he did not preside at the trial, or from any other cause, that he can not fairly pass upon said motion, and allow and sign said bill of exceptions, then he shall grant a new trial as a matter of course to the party moving therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to say a word about the bill. Is it a Senate bill?

Mr. HOAR. It is a House bill, as I explained before. The bill was introduced in the same language precisely as the Senate bill, with the exception of an addition which has been stricken out.

Mr. CHANDLER. Do I understand the Senator that he proposes to ask to have the bill go into conference?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. I only wish to suggest that while the provisions of the bill seem to be unobjectionable so far as I can see, the title needs amending so as to describe what the effect of the law is.

Mr. HOAR. I shall move an amendment to the title.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 953 of the Revised Statutes relating to the allowance of exceptions."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4066) for the relief of Thomas Stack, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 4087) granting an increase of pension to Ellen M. Mansur;

A bill (S. 1348) granting an increase of pension to Eliza M. Stillman; and

A bill (S. 2190) granting a pension to Emma J. Bidwell.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 4256) granting a pension to James H. Thomas;

A bill (H. R. 2728) granting a pension to Thomas T. Garrison;

A bill (H. R. 4520) granting an increase of pension to George H. French;

A bill (H. R. 7624) granting an increase of pension to Pleasant H. McBride; and

A bill (H. R. 4368) granting a pension to Flora B. Hinds.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9824) authorizing the Secretary of War to make regulations governing the running of loose logs, steamboats, and rafts on certain rivers and streams, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

REPORT ON COPPER RIVER EXPEDITION TO ALASKA.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to move concurrence in the amendments of the House of Representatives to two concurrent resolutions which are upon the table of the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to a Senate concurrent resolution. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That there be printed 4,000 copies of the report of Capt. W. R. Abercrombie on the Copper River exploration expedition to Alaska, transmitted by the Secretary of War, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for distribution by the War Department.

Mr. CARTER. In this connection I desire to make a brief explanation, and it will be then for the Senate to determine what to do with the resolution.

The report referred to is incorporated in a report made upon yesterday and ordered printed—the report which came from the Committee on Military Affairs. It may be desirable to have this report printed separately, but it will be printed, I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Printing, in the report of yesterday from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

TREATY WITH SPAIN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to a concurrent resolution of the Senate, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 2 strike out "twenty" and insert "nine;" in line 6 strike out "thirteen" and insert "six;" in line 7 strike out "seven" and insert "three;" so as to make the concurrent resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound 9,000 copies of the message of the President transmitting the treaty of peace with Spain and the accompanying documents, in one volume, of which 6,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives and 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York, from the Committee on Printing, moves that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RAWLINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $4,000 for expenses and clerk hire in the office of the surveyor-general in the State of Utah for the current fiscal year in addition to appropriation previously made, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MILK AND CREAM IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be directed to furnish the Senate with a report from the inspector of dairy products showing the quality and condition of milk and cream sold in the District of Columbia, and whether same contain any foreign substances deleterious to health, and if so, giving description of such substances, and what legislation is necessary to remedy the evil.

MESSAGES AND PAPERS OF THE PRESIDENTS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to investigate the facts connected with the compilation and publication of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents; the result of the permission given to private persons to use the stereotyped plates; the distribution of copies made, gratuitously or otherwise, by the Government; the sales made by private persons and the methods adopted in making such sales; the circumstances under which the compilation has been copyrighted, and the other material facts surrounding the compilation and distribution of the volumes; and report to the Senate the result of the inquiry and any legislation which may be deemed desirable by the committee.

WAR-REVENUE RECEIPTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the resolution which I submitted yesterday. I ask unanimous consent that it go over until to-morrow, not losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 18th instant approved and signed the following act and joint resolutions:

An act (S. 2336) repealing section 4716 of the Revised Statutes so far as the same may be applicable to the claims of dependent parents of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the Army and Navy of the United States during the war with Spain;

A joint resolution (S. R. 34) authorizing the printing of 35,000 copies of Bulletin No. 24, Department of Agriculture, entitled "A Primer of Forestry," for the use of Congress and the Department of Agriculture; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 108) providing for the printing of the report of the governor of Arizona for 1899.

GOVERNMENT OF PORTO RICO.

Mr. FORAKER. If now in order, I desire to call up for present consideration Senate joint resolution 116.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the resolution touching the election case in Pennsylvania. It will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. TURLEY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 3, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks for the consideration of a joint resolution and that the resolution just laid before the Senate be temporarily laid aside. The joint resolution will be again read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 116) to provide for the administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico pending the appointment and qualification of the civil officers provided for in the act approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," as follows:

Resolved, etc., That until the officer to fill any office provided for by the act of April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," shall have been appointed and qualified, the officer or officers now performing the civil duties pertaining to such office may continue to perform the same under the authority of said act; and no officer of the Army shall lose his commission by reason thereof: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held to extend the time for the appointment and qualification of any such officers beyond the 1st day of August, 1900.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I should like to ask some questions about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is recognized.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the joint resolution why this measure is necessary. I understand that there will be some difficulty in substituting a civil government for a military government, and that the new governor may not feel disposed to rush in and seek to organize his civil government without a little time to look around and sort of feel easy in his seat and get a little acquainted with conditions. But the point I have in my mind is this: Porto Rico is not under the Constitution of the United States, we have been told. It therefore is not subject to any laws of the United States except those which we enacted in the bill last week for its government. I should like the Senator to tell me whether, under that act for the government of Porto Rico, there is any requirement which would prohibit Army officers from continuing to hold these places for the time being.

Mr. FORAKER. All that is explained in the message sent to the Senate by the President yesterday.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am like other Senators; I have not had time to examine this matter, and I am trying to get light now.

Mr. FORAKER. I have no objection whatever to repeating it to the Senator as well as I can, though if he would read the message he would find it better stated there than I am able to state it.

The President calls attention to the fact that the civil government provided for is to go into effect on the 1st day of May. He is required to make quite a number of appointments in order to set the machinery of that government into operation. He calls our attention to the fact that there is so little time intervening between now and the 1st day of May that it is impossible for him to make selections that will be entirely satisfactory to him. He wants additional time, and inasmuch as the law goes into effect the 1st day of May and the military government which is now in operation there must at that time necessarily cease, there will be no authority for anybody to exercise official power there after May 1 unless Congress takes some such action as is provided for in this joint resolution.

The joint resolution provides simply that the officials who are now there exercising the duties of the various offices they are holding shall continue to exercise those duties until the officers provided for in the civil government can be appointed and qualified in accordance with the requirements of the act.

The joint resolution, however, is not indefinite as to the time that shall be taken by the President therefor, for it contains a proviso to the effect that no such official shall continue longer than until the 1st day of next August.

I will call the Senator's attention to the further fact that according to the requirement of the act establishing civil government quite a number of appointments must be made from the native inhabitants of the island of Porto Rico. The President does not feel sufficiently advised with respect to the qualifications of individuals there to make those selections. He has appointed a governor. The governor is about to start to Porto Rico. He sails, I believe, on Saturday next. It is desirable, I think everybody can see and appreciate, that he should have an opportunity to visit the island and personally examine into the situation, and then recommend to the President what he may deem advisable to do with respect to the organization of that government and the necessary appointments there.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. In the civil government do not these officers merely keep their military titles and salaries, or do they draw salaries in addition to their military compensation?

Mr. FORAKER. They do not draw any additional salaries. They simply draw their military salaries, as I understand it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if there is not a very rigid law on the statute book which would endanger the military commissions of those officers if they went on for this short period of time and performed their civil functions?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; there is on the statute book a section which is referrred to in the President's message which prohibits any military officer from exercising any duties as a civil officer under the penalty of losing his commission and rank in the Army if he does so.

Mr. CHANDLER. Therefore it is absolutely necessary, in order to prevent a hiatus, that the military officer should be relieved from that duty.

Mr. FORAKER. It is absolutely necessary.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the point has not been elucidated by anyone, either the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from New Hampshire, as to why this loss of office by the Army officers would take place. The Constitution of the United States is not there, we have been told, and it has been hammered into us until I suppose some of us have got to consent to the fact, whether it is a law or not, until the Supreme Court has determined the question. I want to know how it is and why it is that these officers would lose their positions in a territory outside of the United States under a law that does not apply to that territory.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, it is not a constitutional provision that makes this legislation necessary in that respect, but a statute of the United States. The law providing for a civil government expressly extends to Porto Rico all the statutory laws of the United States not locally inapplicable, and a statute which prohibits an officer of the United States Army from holding and exercising the duties of a civil office would be locally applicable in Porto Rico as prescribed in that statute.

Mr. BACON. Is not that restricted to officers in the United States?

Mr. FORAKER. No, sir.

Mr. BACON. I would be glad to have the Senator get the law and read it to us. Will the Senator refer to the statute?

Mr. FORAKER. The United States Army is very likely to be outside of the United States.

Mr. BACON. But the point I am after is the restrictions as to officers, if that is not limited to officers while in the United States.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not so understand it. I will get the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BACON. I think it is in the statute, but the Senator does not.

Mr. CHANDLER. I really hope the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Georgia will rediscuss this question on the Philippine bill, after this joint resolution has passed, because it is very important that the joint resolution should be passed this morning.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire is always endeavoring to rush something here without giving the Senate an opportunity to understand just exactly what it is doing.

Now, is it the purpose in having this joint resolution passed so hurriedly to have the military government there continue for the grand pageant that is to come off on the 1st of May, when the inauguration of our new governor down there takes place?

You have all read in the papers that we are going to have the grandest ceremonial that has ever been seen in any part of the United States on that day, for the purpose, I suppose, of impressing the islanders with the grandeur and greatness of our country as well as impressing the people of the United States with the new policy of imperialism by which this pro-consul or governor is to take possession of this little territory of 4,000 square miles and a million or so of colonists or subjects under the new departure in our history.

After a while, of course, we will have another governor sent to the Philippines, and he will be of so much greater importance than the governor of the little colony of Porto Rico that I suppose we will have to have the Navy to escort him across the Pacific, and he will have umbrellas, such as the Dey of Algiers and the Sultan of Morocco use, held over him as he marches forth in the gaze of his subjects. So we will have our subject and subsidized princes down in the Sulu Archipelago, the Sultan, with his numerous wives, and the Datos commanding his bodyguard of Mohammedans, and all that sort of thing.

I presume it is necessary to have a whole lot of brass buttons and epaulets, with the paraphernalia of a military procession and the booming of cannon, and it could not be gotten in readiness by the 1st of May if we had to tear up by the roots the present military establishment and substitute therefor a civil government. If that is the purpose, I yield without a moment's further obstruction to the passage of the joint resolution. Let our people read in the papers of the imperial pomp and circumstance attending our new policy and be ready for the impending changes in our republican simplicity.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? There is nothing before the Senate for debate.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MASON. I rose to ask simply for the reading of the joint resolution. I was not able to hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported the third time.

Mr. MASON. To save time, I will object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois objects.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator can move to take it up.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator was not present in the Chamber when the joint resolution was read, I hope that it may be read for his benefit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the joint resolution.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

Mr. FORAKER. Now I renew my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio for the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Before the joint resolution is acted upon, I would be very glad if the Senator will read the statute which I think he now has.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly. The statute referred to in the President's message, and referred to by me in the remarks made a moment ago, is found in section 1222 of the Revised Statutes, and reads as follows:

SEC. 1222. No officer of the Army on the active list shall hold any civil office, whether by election or appointment, and every such officer who accepts or exercises the functions of a civil office shall thereby cease to be an officer of the Army, and his commission shall be thereby vacated.

Mr. BACON. The question I asked the learned Senator is whether or not that did not necessarily refer to offices in the United States, whether that statute contemplated any other offices?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know what may have been in the minds of the legislative body when they framed that section. That is possible, what the Senator says. But certainly it is broad enough to apply to any civil office created by an act of Congress the duties of which are to be exercised elsewhere.

Mr. BACON. Then I will ask the Senator the question whether it is not true that in Cuba at present the officers of the United States Army are exercising the duties of civil officers and receiving large salaries outside of their salaries as officers of the Army?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not understand that any officer of the United States Army in Cuba is exercising the function of a civil office. The occupation in Cuba is somewhat peculiar, we must all admit; but still it is a military occupation, as I understand it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator does not understand——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. The occupation in Cuba is based on belligerent right, and whatever duty he is there discharging the officer in question, if there be any one in question, he is exercising a military and not a civil duty.

Mr. BACON. The point I make is this: Of course if an officer in Cuba is there exercising only the office of an officer of the United States Army, he is only authorized to receive the pay of an officer of the Army; and if he is receiving an additional salary, it must be in the exercise of some office other than his military office.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Now, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, the Senator spoke of my having some particular person in view. I have not, but it is my general information (and it is entirely general and may be equally erroneous) that the officers of the United States Army on duty in Cuba are many of them receiving very large salaries in addition to their pay as officers of the Army. If I am wrong in that, of course I desire to be corrected.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator if he has any definite information as to that fact?

Mr. BACON. I have distinctly stated in the hearing of the Senator from New Hampshire that I did not and that I might be in error in the general understanding which I have.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, I should like to have the Senator——

Mr. BACON. I should like to have the Senator from New Hampshire give information on that point if he has it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not any. I should like to have the Senator offer a resolution calling for information on that point, for I very much doubt whether any Army officer in Cuba has the right to receive one dollar additional——

Mr. BACON. I will accommodate the Senator. I will submit a resolution of inquiry on the subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. And I do not believe he has received one dollar additional.

Mr. BACON. I do not know that it is the case, and I hope that it is not.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am not aware of it if such is the fact.

Mr. FORAKER. I have no personal knowledge as to what is being done in Cuba. If there is anything being done there that the Senator wants to take exception to, I hope it will be found, upon examination, to be all right, valid, and legal. I do not know what the facts are, and I express no judgment upon that at this time. But however that may be, I trust that this joint resolution may be allowed to pass, for surely it is necessary that there should be such a provision as this to enable an Army officer, after the 1st day of May, to perform the duties of any one of these officers, because he will be then exercising the functions of a civil office.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. I was going to make a suggestion. It is stated and generally believed, and I have never seen it contradicted, that the Army officers in some of our insular possessions are drawing pay as Army officers and also as civil officers. If that is the case, there could be no objection to this amendment, by inserting between lines 9 and 10:

And no officer of the Army shall receive any additional pay or emoluments for such civil service nor lose his commission by reason thereof.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no objection to that.

Mr. FORAKER. I have no objection if the Senator thinks it necessary; but the tenure under this enactment will be so short, it does seem to me it is not a matter of very much moment.

Mr. MASON. I shall not insist on offering the amendment if the Senator from Ohio does not think it necessary.

Mr. FORAKER. I would rather the Senator would not offer it on this measure.

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator from Ohio a still further question.

Mr. MASON. I have not offered, and I do not offer, the amendment. I should think, however, that it would be a wise provision.

Mr. BACON. I understand, according to my recollection of the Porto Rican bill, that there are officers to be appointed under that bill who have to be confirmed by the Senate. Am I not correct?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir; many of them have to be confirmed.

Mr. BACON. The point I wish to suggest to the Senator is this: It has been published in the papers and has not been denied—on the contrary, I understand it to be generally conceded—that there has been some expressed desire from the executive department that Congress shall adjourn in June and that, in consequence of that communication to the leading members of the two Houses, there is a well-considered acquiescence on the part of those who are understood to control the question as to the sessions of Congress that we shall adjourn some time early in June in compliance with the expressed Executive wish that Congress should be then adjourned. We have heard it stated upon this floor within the past twenty-four hours, I think, that Congress ought to adjourn by the 1st of June and that it is entirely practicable that it shall do so. While I doubt very much whether that can be done, I have no doubt whatever, under the statements which have been made and the wishes which have been expressed by the Executive, that we shall adjourn during the month of June, and in all probability before the middle of June.

Mr. President, if that be the case, is not the Senator extending the limit too far when he fixes the date at the 1st of August for the appointment of the Porto Rican civil officers? In other words, if we are to adjourn by the middle of June, and if, as the Senator from Ohio states, almost all of these officers to be appointed to positions outside of the United States are still to be confirmed by the Senate of the United States, should not the limitation be such that there can be a reasonable probability that the officers who are to be sent to the island of Porto Rico shall be officers confirmed by the Senate before they enter upon their duties? Is not this an invitation that the nomination of officers for these most important and novel duties shall be made subsequent to the adjournment of Congress and after the opportunity for confirmation by the Senate has been lost? While it may be proper—and I am inclined to think it is; in fact, I will say that it is proper—that there should be an extension, ought not that extension to be limited to a time within a reasonable expectation of the adjournment of the present session of Congress?

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I am glad to be able to say that I know that the date of the adjournment of Congress had nothing to do with the fixing of the date in this joint resolution; that is to say, it was not fixed at August 1 with a view to having the appointments postponed until after Congress adjourned.

Mr. BACON. I quite agree with the Senator, but that had not occurred to me.

Mr. FORAKER. It did not occur to me, and I am sure it did not occur to the Secretary of War, with whom I talked in regard to it.

Mr. BACON. I am sure the Senator will not understand me as intimating that that is the design or that he had any such purpose.

Mr. FORAKER. In fact, I think most of the appointments will be made before this session of Congress adjourns, though some of them may not be made that early. I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator; but I do not know when Congress will adjourn, and I think the joint resolution had better stand as it is.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We on this side of the Chamber, I think, ought to be obliged to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] in that he is able to communicate to us what the expressed wish of the President of the United States is with reference to adjournment. For one, I feel very much under obligations to the Senator. I had not heard of it before.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me. He has not read the newspapers of the city if he has not heard of it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I think I might almost say that I had not heard of it if I had read the newspapers of the city; but I have yet to learn that when the President expresses a wish to Congress he expresses it through the newspapers of the city.

Mr. BACON. That was not my statement, Mr. President. My statement was that the newspapers had announced the fact that the President had communicated that wish to leading members of the dominant party in each House of Congress that Congress should adjourn at an early date.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. As I do not reckon myself——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Just allow me to say one word, please.

As I do not reckon myself among the dominant members of either party in Congress, it is not surprising that I might not have heard of this expressed wish of the President. I am therefore exceedingly obliged to the Senator from Georgia for communicating it to the Senate and to me.

Mr. BACON. I am sure I am very much gratified to be able to serve the Senator.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But I do want to say this, however, in addition, that whatever the President of the United States may think about the wisdom of our adjournment, the propriety of it, and the possibility of it, with due regard to the business of the country, I think, so far as I know the opinions of Senators, they are all in favor of an early adjournment; and I think, so far as I know the sentiment of the country, that the country would be very glad to have us adjourn even before the 1st of June.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say that I think the Senator is entirely correct. Nothing can be done at this session of Congress except that which is the work of the dominant party, and the less of it that is done the better, and the sooner we adjourn without doing any of it the more gratified the country will be. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY. I think, on the contrary, that the country expects us to stay here until whatever is essentially necessary and important shall be accomplished, I do not care whether it be until August or September.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to offer an amendment to the joint resolution, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 13 it is proposed to add:

And it is further provided, That no officer of the Army shall receive any pay or emolument for service rendered in any civil capacity.

Mr. FORAKER. I suggest to the Senator to insert "in addition to his salary as an officer."

Mr. DANIEL. "In addition to his salary as an officer." Let those words be added.

Mr. FORAKER. With those words added, I accept the amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. It seems to me, Mr. President, that this is a wise and just joint resolution, and I do not think there ought to be any opposition at all to it. I hope the Senate will vote for it with this addition. It seems to me evidently just, and with that addition I think the legislation is unexceptionable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of line 13 the following:

And it is further provided, That no officer of the Army shall receive any pay or emolument for service rendered in any civil capacity in addition to his salary as an officer.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest, after the word "Army," to add the words "on the active list."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Do the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from New Hampshire propose to make a different rule for the Army than for the Navy?

Mr. DANIEL. There is no objection to putting "the Navy" in.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator object to my suggested amendment?

Mr. DANIEL. I do. An officer of the Army is an officer of the Army, and is referred to as such in the statutes.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand the Senator's amendment to be what the existing law now is. I think the law, however, is different as to retired officers, who are allowed to sometimes hold civil offices.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand this to apply to civil offices; not offices that are held under the military occupation, if there be a proper distinction to be made. I inquire of the Senator if he has any objection to adding the word "hereunder" after the word "rendered?"

Mr. DANIEL. It seems to me the proposition is a good one in general; but I have no objection to confining it to this resolution. We are not prepared to consider other matters.

Mr. FORAKER. That is the only reason that I ask it. I have no objection to the amendment with the modification suggested.

Mr. DANIEL. I have no objection to confining it to Porto Rico. We are dealing with the question of a civil government for Porto Rico.

Mr. FORAKER. I suggest to insert after the words "service rendered" the word "hereunder."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] makes inquiry whether this will not apply to the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator modifies his amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. If we make it general, it might strike somewhere where we have not investigated, and we should be surprised ourselves to see its effect. We are legislating for Porto Rico, and I would confine this matter to the government of Porto Rico and not intermix general legislation with the amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like the attention of the Senator from Virginia. We have an island somewhere called Guam, and there is an officer of the Navy who is governor of Guam. We have another island somewhere else out there—and very few of us know where it is, and never heard of it until recently—called Tutuila. The newspapers have made statements in regard to the matter; but we are told that they never tell the truth about the Administration, although many of them are Republican in their politics. It is stated that some officer of the Navy has been detailed as governor of Tutuila, and I should like to know whether Naval officers occupying such positions are drawing additional salaries. We also have along with these numerous high-paid commissions who are traveling around the world, drawing ten or fifteen thousand dollars a year salary. Let us try to get this thing straight.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I suggest that there be inserted the words "for service under this act."

Mr. FORAKER. I think the amendment is in proper form now. It is so restricted. I ask that the amendment be again stated, as it has been modified.

Mr. DAVIS. Let the amendment be read as it now stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 13 it is proposed to add:

And it is further provided, That no officer of the Army shall receive any pay or emolument for service rendered hereunder in any civil capacity in addition to his salary as an officer.

Mr. DANIEL. It seems to me that will answer.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if he can not make that retroactive? We now are discussing a question on the Alaska bill that seeks to make that proposed law retroactive, and while I am a little opposed to retroactive legislation, I think if any officer of the Army has been drawing a salary for performing his duties as an officer of the Army, and in addition a salary by reason of his civil functions, the thing ought not to be allowed, and we ought to stop it.

Mr. DANIEL. It seems to me we had better confine ourselves to the matter before us. The information of some Senators is that no Army officer has been receiving any salary for performing civil functions; and I take it for granted that such is the case. We ought to deal with cases as to which we are advised, because otherwise we are led into hasty and ill-considered legislation in trying to accomplish too much. As to Guam and these other islands, it is all right and proper that naval officers should be governors of them. We have annexed the islands; they are under military occupation, and the President has not exceeded the propriety of his duty in appointing either naval or Army officers to their temporary government. Otherwise he would have been obliged to ship an Army officer to Guam and make him governor, but as a war ship was there, it was more convenient and appropriate to make a naval officer the governor until such time as Congress may legislate about the matter. That has been done all through our history. It was an appropriate thing to do. We can not, however, consider all those matters in providing a civil government for Porto Rico. If we can get that thing right, or as near right as we approximately may, we shall have done the best that the case admits of.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Virginia and I differ as to the advisability or the necessity of the President having some head or officer in control of those islands of Guam and Tutuila. The question is in regard to the payment of those Army or Navy officers for services as civil officers in addition to the pay which they already receive. That is the only point I was trying to make. I was not objecting to the appointment of a governor for Guam. I know we have got to have somebody there in authority. It is only a question as to the pay.

We are starting out on an entirely new programme of imperialism, and we have got to keep track of the thing as it goes along. We do not know what is going to happen unless we do keep track of the Executive action. Congress at least should know what is being done, so that we may know whether it is proper to indorse it or otherwise.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not believe a single Army or Navy officer has received a dollar for civil services. The resolution the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] will offer will bring out that fact. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] limits the effect of this joint resolution, and therefore I do not think there can be any sound objection now remaining to its passage.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, the impression created by what has been said on the other side of the Chamber to the effect that Army officers have been receiving additional salary or compensation for performing civil duties in Porto Rico is erroneous and misleading. The testimony of General Davis before the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico refutes that idea absolutely. I read from his testimony:

> All the collectors of customs are Army officers, who receive no salary and no allowance. No Army officer in Porto Rico receives any salary allowance from the insular funds.

This is specific and admits of no room for doubt. The compensation which the Army officers receive as such is all that they are paid.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the statement is made in the newspapers, which never tell the truth, that Admiral Dewey claimed compensation as a member of the Philippine Commission; and with these various questions, which, as I said, are entirely new, arising every day, there can be no harm in us keeping track of what is going on.

Mr. HAWLEY. Can not that be attended to by some subsequent legislation and let this business go ahead?

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, it seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] is objectionable. The law at present, as I understand it, is that no military or naval officer detailed for civil service can receive any additional compensation. This proposed amendment is to the effect that the military or naval officers detailed to perform civil service in Porto Rico shall not receive additional compensation for that service. That tends to weaken the general law, and implies that military or naval officers detailed elsewhere may receive such additional compensation.

It seems to me it would be safer, at least, to omit the provision entirely from this joint resolution, and let the matter stand under the general law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] as modified.

The amendment as modified was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 1929.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to secure consideration for a conference report.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will give way to the Senator from Illinois in a moment. I only want to get the bill up.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to have the conference report which I submitted yesterday considered.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, is the routine morning business finished?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is; and the resolution in regard to the seat in the Senate from Pennsylvania, which has been laid before the Senate, has been temporarily laid aside.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I ask that the resolution may go over until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the resolution touching the Senatorial case from Pennsylvania go over until to-morrow morning. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. McMILLAN. I now ask that Senate bill 1929 may be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read by its title the bill (S. 1929) to provide for eliminating certain grade crossings on the line of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company in the city of Washington, D. C., and requiring said company to depress and elevate its tracks, and to enable it to relocate parts of its railroad therein.

Mr. CULLOM. If the bill of the Senator from Michigan is now before the Senate, I ask the Senator to yield to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not before the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. When it is before the Senate I should like to have the conference report considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read in full for the information of the Senate, but it will not be before the Senate until the Senate has consented to take it up.

Mr. CULLOM. Then, if the bill is to be read in full, I hope the Senator will yield until I can have action on the conference report.

Mr. McMILLIN. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

Mr. CULLOM. I now ask for the consideration of the conference report, which I submitted yesterday, on the bill providing a government for the Territory of Hawaii.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks for the consideration of the conference report submitted by him yesterday; which will be read.

Mr. BACON. Do I understand that this is a report of the conference committee on the Hawaiian bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BACON. May I inquire whether or not it has been printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been printed.

Mr. CULLOM. It has been printed, and it is probably on the Senator's table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the report will be proceeded with.

The Secretary read the report as printed in the proceedings of the Senate of yesterday.

Mr. CULLOM. There is a mistake in the last clause of the conference report, which reads:

> Section 104, line 3, after the word "section," strike out the word "fifty-two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty-three."

I failed to correct the error resulting from the numbering of the sections. It should be 52.

Mr. SPOONER obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin has been recognized.

Mr. LODGE. I beg pardon. I was not aware of that.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, it is quite impossible to gain any very definite information from the reading of this report as to what changes have been made in the bill as it passed the Senate. I should like to have the Senator explain, if he will, briefly the essential changes, particularly with reference to the provision incorporated in the bill by the Senate concerning contract labor.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator from Illinois proceeds with his explanation, I should like to make a suggestion. It seems to me impossible to understand this conference report from its mere reading at the desk, and it will be equally impossible, after the explanation of the Senator from Illinois, for us to intelligently contrast, as we should do, the Senate bill with the House bill as it came to us and as it has been brought back to us by the conferees. Of course we all know this is a voluminous bill, 55 pages long. I hope I may have the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], if of no other Senators, because I wish to make a suggestion for a practical purpose.

Mr. CULLOM. Excuse me; I was interrupted and I did not hear the last remark of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. The last remark I made was that I hoped I might have the attention of the Senator from Illinois——

Mr. CULLOM. I was trying to give it to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. For the reason that the suggestion I propose to make is for a practical purpose. I was trying to show the difficulty of our contrasting the two measures, which it is recognized by every one we should have a fair opportunity to do. We passed an elaborate bill upon the subject of the government of the Hawaiian Islands. We sent it to the House. The House sent us back a bill in the form of a substitute.

In other words, they sent back what purported to be an entire bill. That bill corresponded very largely with the Senate bill; but still, from the fact that they sent it back not in the shape of amendments to the various provisions of the Senate bill, but in the shape of a substantive entire bill, it would be with the utmost difficulty that we could take the Senate bill and compare it with the House bill, for the reason that even where it corresponds with the Senate bill it is simply put down as part of the House bill, and where it differs from the Senate bill there is nothing to indicate that that is something in which it differs. It is all printed as a new bill, and the only thing that appears to us from this bill by which we can form any accurate judgment as to differences is as to amendments proposed by the conferees to the House bill. In other words, the whole of the bill before us, the House substitute, which is a bill in its entirety, is printed in the ordinary roman text. The House bill, so far as it has been amended by the conferees, has had the part rejected stricken through in the ordinary way, and the part substituted printed in italics in the ordinary way.

The report of the conference committee shows in what the conferees differ from the provisions of the House bill, but there is nothing in this bill as printed by which we can judge as to how far the Senate bill has been changed, and I think it ought to be printed in some way so that when we read a section we will be able to see that that section is as it left the Senate, or, if that section has been changed, it ought to be so indicated that we can, from a perusal of that section, tell in what particular it has been changed. As it is now, the only way in which we can compare the bill reported by the conferees with the Senate bill is to take the original Senate bill in the one hand and the House bill in the other, and possibly requiring that there shall be two engaged in it at the same time, one reading the provision in the Senate bill and the other reading the corresponding provision in the House bill, for the purpose of determining whether or not there has been any change in the Senate provision by the House provision, and if so, what has been the change.

Now, I fully understand, of course, that the Senator from Illinois will as clearly and as accurately as it is practicable for anybody to do, point out to us the changes; but I do say it is impossible for anyone verbally to point out the changes in such a way that it will enable us to determine whether or not they are such changes as will meet with our approval.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Georgia has stated largely the facts as they exist with reference to the conduct of this bill from one House of Congress to the other. It is true, as stated, that the Senate passed a bill. It went to the House, and instead, as we naturally supposed they would do, of their amending the Senate bill in the ordinary way, they did as the Senator has stated—struck out all after the enacting clause and substituted the bill called the House bill. That bill, however, was largely the same bill, containing very many of the same sections, without amendment, that the Senate passed. For instance, I have here a bill not exactly as it passed the Senate, because it is printed with the amendments made by the House incorporated; and, for instance, section 2, section 6, section 7, section 8, I believe section 9——

Mr. BACON. I would inquire of the Senator whether he is prepared to take up the two bills, section by section, and show the sections which are identical and those in which changes have been made?

Mr. CULLOM. I can as to most of the bill. I wish to say that I do not want anything unreasonable in reference to this matter. All I want is to get the conference report considered as soon as we can consistently, and with all the information that anybody wants, if we can give it. But there are a large number of very inconsequential amendments made to the Senate bill, which constitute what is called the substitute or House bill, to which the Senate conferees agreed; but the substantial provisions of the bill, or many of them, are as the Senate passed the bill. For instance, as to the land matter, the Senate provisions on that subject are accepted by the House. As to the Federal court, the Senate provision was accepted by the House—I mean the House conferees, not the House itself. So most of the important provisions of the bill as it passed the Senate are retained in the bill as it comes before the Senate now in the conference report and exactly, so far as concerns the provision establishing a Federal court, as it passed the Senate of the United States.

If the Senator is very anxious for a little time, I wish to inquire whether a couple of hours would be all that is necessary for the Senator, or would he want a longer time to look over the two bills?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to say before that is done——

Mr. BACON. I think the same course ought to be pursued in this matter that is pursued ordinarily, that we ought to have this measure printed in a way that we can conveniently compare the two.

Mr. CULLOM. I was going to say you can get bills now, if you desire them, with the Senate bill all stricken out, lines drawn through its text, but still you can read exactly what the provisions are. There are plenty of those bills which can be secured at any time.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me.

Mr. CULLOM. It is very difficult to print this report—because that is what it is now—in any other way than it is printed, because it is a substitute, and the substitute was acted upon by the conferees, and all the amendments that are in the substitute were concurred in by the conferees of the two Houses. I can hardly see how you can print the bill so as to give any more light upon the subject than you can get now than by getting the Senate bill as amended by the House, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the House bill, except that you want to get the amendments to the substitute which passed the House, because the conferees have amended that measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the last amendment—

Section 104, line 3, after the word "section," strike out the word "fifty-two," and insert in lieu thereof "fifty-three."

It is clearly a mistake.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair knows of no way in which it can be remedied except by the Senator withdrawing the report and having the committee of conference amend it. There is no other way of which the Chair knows.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the conferees on the part of the Senate regarded that as a mistake in writing "three" instead of "two."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It appears very clearly in both reports, House and Senate, to have been a deliberate striking out of "fifty-two" and inserting "fifty-three." A report of a conference committee can not be amended, and the Chair knows of no way except for the Senator to withdraw the report and have the conferees correct it.

Mr. CULLOM. I am fully aware that an ordinary error can not be changed by any one of the conferees without the consent of all, but I regarded this, and I think my colleague on the conference committee thought so, too, as a sort of clerical mistake, which might be corrected without referring it back. But if the Chair thinks differently, of course we will act accordingly. It was a mistake on the part of the clerk.

Mr. BACON. As the report is not to be considered now, I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois whether it is not practicable in the interim to have the bill so printed that we can tell in what particulars changes have been made without having to take the two bills and read them paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. CULLOM. How would the Senator suggest that it be printed so that it would be any plainer than it is now, with the bill as it passed the Senate before him?

Mr. BACON. I do not know how I can better answer the Senator than to refer to the suggestion which he made to me. The Senator asked me whether or not two hours would be sufficient for me to take these two bills and retire to some secluded spot and compare them. If I did so, that would not be information for the balance of the Senate. There are other Senators here as well as I who want to have this information. I am not asking it for myself alone.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand.

Mr. BACON. And it ought to be put in shape where the Senate will be advised of the changes which are made. We want to know two things. We want to know, in the first place, what changes the House bill makes in the Senate bill. That does not appear by any printed document we have here, except we have the printed Senate bill and we have the printed House bill, the one to be compared with the other. The other thing we want to know is this: After the House, by means of a substitute, has amended the Senate proposition, in what particulars has the conference committee changed the two propositions?

Mr. CULLOM. That is shown in the bill which the Senator has before him.

Mr. BACON. I understand that thoroughly.

Mr. CULLOM. Then why do you ask the question?

Mr. BACON. I am not asking the question. I am stating what is the issue we have to make. I say there are two things upon which we are to be informed when we come to pass upon this question. We have the amendments proposed by the conference committee to the House substitute, but there is nothing there to show how far the conference committee has adopted what was originally the Senate provision or how far it has adopted that which was the House provision.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Illinois that the usual course has been to number the amendments to any bill which the Senate has sent to the House of Representatives and to point out just what changes or substitutions have been made. If that were done in respect to this bill, we could very easily keep track of it.

Mr. LODGE. There was but one amendment made to this bill.

Mr. CULLOM. By the House.

Mr. LODGE. It is impossible to number the amendments, as the Senator from South Carolina suggests, as there was but one amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the House bill. All that the conferees could do under that circumstance was to report back the amendment with amendments. There was no other way of doing it. We followed that method, which is the only one open to us. The House bill is in the main the Senate bill, and there is no way of getting at the changes except by laying the Senate bill alongside the conference report and comparing them line by line.

Mr. BACON. Could not that comparison, after it was made, be put in writing, so that it could be printed and brought to us?

Mr. LODGE. It is here on your desk. You can not do anything except to put the two bills together.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking of the comparison being put in writing. Take section 3 of the bill; if it is identical, it would be perfectly competent by marginal notes to say "no change." Take section 4; if that has been stricken out and another substituted, it would be perfectly competent to put the stricken lines through Senate section No. 4, and to put adjacent thereto the House section No. 4 which has been substituted therefor. As it is, we have the bill in its entirety as it left the Senate stricken through, and we have the bill in its entirety as it came back from the House put in italics, but there is nothing by which we can contrast one section with another.

Mr. LODGE. The great mass of the two bills is the same, and the great mass of the amendments are perfectly trivial amendments, chiefly verbal. The important amendments can be compared by any Senator by laying the Senate bill alongside the conference report. There is no other way to compare them. If we printed what the Senator from Georgia asks for, it would be simply printing the Senate bill alongside of the conference report. He would have to make the comparison just the same when they were printed together.

Mr. BACON. It would not be the same if each section which was not amended was so stated, and if each section which was amended should be expressed as amended and the amendment printed in full by the side of it, so that we could see what it is.

Mr. LODGE. There are a great mass of amendments. I am not sure that I understand just what kind of a reprint the Senator from Georgia wants; but if I do understand, it would be a very great labor to reprint all those small amendments; to take the Senate bill, compare it line by line, word by word, with the House substitute and show every change, small and large, and then all the amendments made in the conference report, which are the only important ones.

Mr. BACON. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question, because we are both after practical results. The Senator says the amendments are of two classes; that there are some material amendments and some trivial ones, but there are very few material amendments and many trivial ones. Suppose the House, instead of sending us back an entire substitute which expressed all of its changes, had taken up the Senate bill and had expressed each as a separate amendment, would it not have been perfectly practicable for the Senate to have printed its bill with the amendments as thus expressed by the House; and if so, is it not now practicable?

Mr. LODGE. The Senate bill would have come back with the House amendments, but the House did not amend it in that way.

Mr. BACON. The Senator does not let me finish my question.

Mr. LODGE. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator had finished.

Mr. BACON. Is it not now equally practicable to take the Senate bill and show as to each provision in what way it has been amended by the House substitute? Then we could compare it with the conference report.

Mr. CULLOM. Let me make an inquiry, to find out, if I can, what would satisfy the Senator. I hold in my hand a Senate bill with the amendments agreed to by the House incorporated in it. Subsequent to the House bill as a substitute coming here we had, as the Senator from Massachusetts and I have both stated, to consider the substitute instead of the Senate bill as it would be amended if the substitute were all in it. If that would be satisfactory to the Senator, I can prepare a Senate bill with every provision of the House bill as it passed the House in it. Would that satisfy him?

Mr. BACON. Showing what was the Senate bill and what was changed?

Mr. CULLOM. Showing what the Senate did with the House bill.

Mr. BACON. The Senator means what the House did with the Senate bill.

Mr. CULLOM. Showing what amendments the House bill makes to the Senate bill.

Mr. BACON. That is all I want.

Mr. CULLOM. We could not consider it in that way in conference, because the bill before us was the Senate bill with the number and title only and the House bill in place of all after the enacting clause. But if it will satisfy the Senator, I am willing to postpone the further consideration of this matter to-day and to prepare a Senate bill with every amendment in it made by the House.

Mr. BACON. That is everything I could possibly ask.

Mr. CULLOM. And then that will have to be compared with the substitute bill as amended by the conferees.

Mr. BACON. As amended by the conferees. The substitute bill, in other words, will correspond with the bill which the Senator proposes to prepare.

Mr. CULLOM. What does the Senator want; the Senate bill with the House amendments as it passed the House or the Senate bill with the House amendments as amended by the conferees?

Mr. BACON. That is shown now, Mr. President. The amendments of the conferees are shown.

Mr. CULLOM. But it would not be on the same paper.

Mr. BACON. So far as the amendments of the conferees are concerned there is no trouble about them.

Mr. CULLOM. No.

Mr. BACON. But the trouble is that the Senate conferees agreed to the House bill with certain changes; and we are unable to see what changes have been made in the Senate bill by the House bill, and if the Senator will prepare that which will show in what particulars the House bill as it came back from the House and before it went to the conferees changed the Senate bill, that is all that is necessary.

Mr. CULLOM. I will undertake to do that to satisfy the Senator from Georgia and Senators generally. I will prepare a Senate bill with all the amendments made to it by the House and have it printed and before the Senate as soon as I can get it ready. It may be a day or two, as it involves considerable work.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do I understand that the Senate conferees agreed absolutely to the changes of the House? Are there no changes in the House bill?

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from South Carolina will look at his bill he will see that there are a great many changes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Unless you point out the changes which the House made to the Senate bill and also the changes which the conferees made in the House bill, we will still be at sea.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill I reported shows the amendments made by the conferees. So I do not need to go over that any more, I should think.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois whether it is not a fact now that we have before us the bill as it passed the Senate and went to the House, and that which the House reported and passed as a substitute, and then the conference report inserting certain amendments to that substitute?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. We have the two bills printed in one. If you take up section 1 of the Senate bill and section 2 of the House bill can you not compare them and thoroughly understand them?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. And then simply see the amendments inserted by the conference committee?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly; it is all there.

Mr. CLAY. It strikes me we have the bills before us now.

Mr. CULLOM. The lines are marked out, according to the Printer's rule, but you can read it easily enough. But if it is insisted that I shall prepare the bill as the senior Senator from Georgia suggests I am willing to do it, so that it shall be perfectly plain.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will do that.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdraw the report for the time being, and will comply with the wishes of the Senate as nearly as possible as regards the printing.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MASON. I merely wish to give a notice on a matter somewhat personal, to which I have had my attention called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MASON. It will not take over five minutes.

Mr. McMILLAN. I yield.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I have had my attention called lately to an amendment to the regular appropriation bill for the District of Columbia, in regard to the public schools, and I desire simply to give notice, so that those who are pressing the amendment will understand, that I intend, unless I have further information on the subject, to object to the amendment, and if the matter goes into conference, and it is not too late, I shall make the point of order that it is new legislation upon an appropriation bill.

As a reason for that course of conduct, I desire to state that I regard the amendment, from what little opportunity I have had to read it, while the situation in which it leaves the schools of the District may possibly be fair condition, and the whole course of the investigation, and the report particularly, as rather an unwarranted attack upon the schools of the District of Columbia. I have had personal acquaintance with the schools of the District for perhaps twelve or fifteen years. I have had occasion myself, by reason of members of my own family being in the public schools, to visit every department, particularly within the last three years. I think I can speak advisedly from personal observation that the public schools of Washington are the best public schools, certainly as good as any in the world, and the best I ever visited, and I never saw better discipline and I never saw more faithful attention to duty on the part of the teachers and the students than here.

The report is remarkable in that it goes after the boys and girls of Washington and asks them questions about which they have had no training and expects them to define the different branches of the Government, to separate the executive, the legislative, and the judiciary.

The learned Senator who has been conducting the examination knows that some of the best writers of law in the United States disagree upon the very question asked our school children.

Upon the matter of spelling, I find that the average that they missed according to his own report is less than 3 per cent in a hundred words—two and a fraction per cent. I suppose if the boys and the girls of the High School were to come into the Senate and put us in a class our general average would be about 5 or 6 per cent lower than is found in the High School in the city of Washington.

It is true that there have been some very queer answers given to questions as to the formation of the Government, as to what were the four great countries that have contributed to the settlement of this nation; it is true that many queer and strange answers have come from these young minds, which have not been trained; but I regard this whole thing, this attempt to change the organic law of the schools of the District of Columbia——

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. MASON. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Is this matter before the Senate for discussion now? Whenever it is before the Senate, I shall have something to say, but I do not want to take up the time of the Senate now.

Mr. MASON. There is no doubt about the Senator having something to say when it comes before the Senate. I simply say that I want to give notice. The matter was put through on an appropriation bill. I supposed there was some legislation pending in regard to the schools in the District of Columbia. It was my misfortune. Possibly the Senator thinks I ought to have been observing every movement of appropriation bills, but the Senator is well aware that a man here has many other duties to perform, many constituents to serve, and I was not in the Senate Chamber at the time this amendment was discussed.

Mr. President, I will say further that I intend to make the point of order unless I can see some benefit to be derived. I can see no possible benefit to be derived by changing the present school system and having committees of examination to report the list of misspelled words. I regard that as unfair. I do not believe any Senator would want to have submitted to him a list of a hundred words and then have published to the world the number he misspelled. I think it would be more fair if you would report the ninety-seven words and a fraction that they spelled correctly. I think that would be more fair and better treatment of the public schools, because the public schools in Washington are for the boys and girls, the youth of the city of Washington.

I do not know the superintendent very well. I have not spoken with him for years. I have no interest in it, for it is one of the rules of my life to let the millionaires and the taxpayers build schoolhouses, and I endeavor to furnish my fair share of the occupants. I have always had six or seven in school in Washington, and I make it my business to see that they are getting the very best that this country can give them. The schools of Washington are, in my opinion, the best graded, the most cleanly. They have adopted an excellent system here in all the departments, for I have children in all of the departments of the schools, from the primary grade to the High School. I have tried to leave no branch of the public schools unattended to, so far as my family is concerned.

I shall object, if it is not too late, to legislation going on an appropriation bill that seems to change the whole plan of the schools, and especially when it is based upon a report of answers made by young people of this town on subjects in which they have had no training.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will perceive that this report is part 2. Perhaps he has not read part 1 of the report. Two reports have been made.

Mr. MASON. I do not know how this is marked. I think I have seen two reports. Is there a minority report on the matter?

Mr. GALLINGER. There is not. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the report is made in two parts. It is not a minority report in either instance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. MASON. I so understood it. I had the consent of the Senator who was entitled to the floor, and that is all I have to say. However, before I sit down, I have not said that I should oppose this proposition if it can be shown that it will benefit the schools of Washington, and I am exceedingly sorry that I can not have the attention, or at least be permitted to make my own personal statement upon the floor, without so much——

Mr. STEWART. I desire to give the Senator notice that when this measure comes up properly for discussion, if objection is made to the proposed legislation, I shall give additional reasons why it should be had, which will be satisfactory, no doubt, to the Senator. It will be satisfactory to all sober-minded, thoughtful people at all events. There is no time to do it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator from Illinois concluded?

Mr. MASON. No; I have not finished yet upon this subject. I want the Senator to understand that if he has some concealed weapons about him by which he intends to attack the public-school system and change it here, I am perfectly willing to hear them, and if they are fair and if there is any reason for this amendment I am open to conviction.

Mr. STEWART. I assure the Senator that the arsenal is full, but there has been no opposition that called forth or created the necessity for bringing out and pointing all the guns. It will be done if there is sufficient opposition to justify it.

Mr. MASON. I give the Senator notice that I am here prepared to receive whatever he has in the arsenal against the public-school system.

Mr. STEWART. Whenever there is any disposition to defend that system, then the artillery will be brought out. The arsenal is full.

Mr. MASON. I am prepared and ready now; and if the Senator has any facts he should not conceal them and attempt to pass this legislation through on an appropriation bill.

Mr. STEWART. We furnished sufficient to satisfy everybody else but the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MASON. That is a statement of the Senator, a mere statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts demands the regular order.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC GRADE CROSSINGS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill called up by the Senator from Michigan has been read to the Senate by title. It will be read for the information of the Senate. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill (S. 1929) to provide for eliminating certain grade crossings on the line of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company in the city of Washington, D. C., and requiring said company to depress and elevate its tracks, and to enable it to relocate parts of its railroad therein.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know what bill is being considered, and how it comes here at this time.

Mr. McMILLAN. I asked unanimous consent to take up the bill a half hour ago, and the Secretary is now reading it. It is to eliminate the grade crossings of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is the road that goes across the Mall?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes; it goes across the Mall.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HANSBROUGH in the chair). Objection is made to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will not the Senator consent to have the bill read?

Mr. PETTIGREW. No; that is just what I want to avoid, because the next time it will be brought up and passed in a half minute on the ground that it has heretofore been read. I want to examine it more fully. I may not object later on; but it seems to me that Congress ought to get the railroad off from the Mall entirely and leave that entire space clear. The road would be quite near enough to the city if it were a block or two farther south. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator from Montana will allow me to present a conference report.

Mr. CARTER. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. STEWART. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada presents a conference report.

NAVAJO INDIAN RESERVATION, ARIZ.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4001) authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on the Navajo Indian Reservation, Territory of Arizona, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of the Senate amendment strike out all after the word "Provided" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That all that portion of the Navajo Indian Reservation in Arizona lying north of 36° 30′ north latitude, and west of the one hundred and eleventh meridian, be, and the same is hereby, opened for mining purposes only and subjected to the mining laws of the United States;" and the Senate agree to the same.

WILLIAM M. STEWART,
GEORGE L. SHOUP,
JOHN L. McLAURIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN F. LACEY,
JOHN H. STEPHENS,
CHARLES CURTIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear an explanation of it. What is the effect of the report?

Mr. STEWART. The bill provides for the extension of an Executive order to take in some woodland that the Indians want, and it provides for buying the settlers off. That was the original bill which passed the House. This amendment allows mining only upon a portion of the reservation upon which there are lava beds, and where the Indians do not go at all. It is for the benefit of the Indians, and at the same time allows miners to work only in the lava-bed country where it does no harm. The House objected to it because the language might be construed to open it for other purposes, and so the conferees have confined it to mining only. It is open only to mining.

Mr. COCKRELL. And nothing else?

Mr. STEWART. Nothing else. That was the provision of the House. They limited it as it passed the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

INTERNAL-REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3419, known as the Alaska bill.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate and laid aside. It is only two minutes of 2.

Mr. CARTER. The hour for laying the unfinished business before the Senate has not arrived, and the resolution relating to the Pennsylvania case went over by unanimous consent, I think, until to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; until to-morrow.

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut, who desires to call up a bill.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am obliged to the Senator from Montana for yielding to me. I desire to have Senate bill 2559 passed, which has been reported by the Committee on Finance, and which it is important that it should pass in order to facilitate business at the Treasury Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 2559) authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to redeem or make allowance for internal-revenue stamps; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, in line 2, page 3, section 2, after the word "calculation," to insert "when approved by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I wish that amendment may be disagreed to. I propose to insert another amendment in the bill in lieu of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend until the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in and to the government of the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that that may be temporarily laid aside that the Senator from Connecticut may proceed with his bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the regular order may be laid aside. That will be the order if there is no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I ask that that may be disagreed to, and I propose the following amendment: In line 3, page 1, of the bill, after the words "Internal Revenue," to insert:

Subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the committee amendment be disagreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. What committee amendment is it that you want disagreed to?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will explain. The amendment provides that the conclusions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall, when approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, be final, so that they shall not be upset by accounting officers and auditors. It was thought on consultation at the Treasury Department that it would make too much trouble, that the Secretary should be obliged to sign and approve every order, and the language which I propose, that it shall all be done under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, was thought to be sufficient.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Now I propose the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, page 1, after the word "Revenue," amend by inserting the following:

Subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know whether this provision would cover a case of a bill which was referred to the Committee on Finance, introduced by myself, in regard to a book of stamps that was supposed to have been destroyed by the collector of internal revenue at Kansas City, Mo.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think it would. It allows the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, where stamps have been destroyed or lost or spoiled, to refund upon proper proof being made to him. There are a great many of these cases, and I will state the necessity for passing the bill. It is a reenactment of the old law, but the old law has become obsolete as to some portions of the stamps. The only new thing in it is that the action of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be final and, under the amendment, when made, according to rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary. The difficulty is that the auditor sets up to determine questions of fact as well as law, and holds up the conclusions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who is in possession of all the facts.

Mr. COCKRELL. The reason why I ask about the matter is that I asked the Commissioner of Internal Revenue prior to the assembling of Congress to prepare a bill such as would afford relief in this case, and I was advised by him that a general bill was being prepared. Now, was this bill prepared in his office?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think this is the bill; and I think it affords relief in the matter which the Senator refers to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I hope this bill will pass, and I wish the Finance Committee, or some other committee, might at some time bring in a bill which would apply to correcting such mistakes throughout the entire fiscal service of the country. Every little mistake, or injustice, or accident in a large portion of the public service has no remedy except by coming to Congress for legislation. It ought not to take up the time of Congress, and the petitioners have sometimes to come again and again, and a generation is wasted before a man will get redress for some little thing.

Now, the United States ought to be in the position of an ordinary well-managed business concern, and somebody ought to be trusted. Although there may occasionally be mistakes and possibly sometimes be wrongdoing, it is much better that there should be officers who have this power than that Congress should be the place of resort, where there is quite likely to be mistakes, if not wrongdoing.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think there is great force in what the Senator from Massachusetts says.

Mr. HOAR. I say this not as a criticism of the Senator's bill, but in laudation of it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If the Senator will prepare such a bill, I know the Finance Committee will be very glad to consider it. The Secretaries, however, are, to a certain extent, now authorized to correct those matters. The Post-Office Department can correct them to a limited amount; the Secretary of the Treasury can issue duplicate checks to the amount of $2,500; and there are other instances. But I have no doubt there might be a bill applying to all the operations of the Government, which would facilitate the business which people have with the Departments and which would relieve them from a great many annoyances that they are now subjected to. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know what the bill is. I should like to have it explained. What is the particular reason why it comes here?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, the Senator was not in when I called up the bill. The old law—that is, the law which was passed when we had the stamp duties formerly—authorized the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make allowance for stamps which had been lost or destroyed or spoiled, and to refund the money. That law is not applicable to all cases of stamps which are authorized by the new law. This is a reenactment of the old law so as to include all the stamps and allow the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to hear the facts, see whether they were lost or spoiled, or not used, and to make allowance for them; and it makes him a final judge as to whether an allowance ought to be made, subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is all there is about it?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is all there is in it.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CORCORAN ART GALLERY.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to call up the bill (S. 2610) to authorize the purchase of the property known as the Corcoran Art Gallery, in the City of Washington, D. C. It is a short bill and will take no time, I think.

Mr. CARTER. I will yield to the Senator, providing the bill does not lead to discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which will be read at length for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. WARREN. There are certain amendments offered by the committee——

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to offer some, to come in before them, in line 5, on the first page.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will suspend until the Chair ascertains if there is objection to the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I reserve the right to object to the extent of not having the bill read until I know more about it. I should like to hear the Senator's amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill has been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. But the committee amendments have not been read.

Mr. PETTIGREW. By that I mean that I do not desire hereafter that the bill shall be called up and a statement made that it has been read, and then passed without any consideration. I suppose I have the right to object and that it would have to be read over again in full if it were considered hereafter, the bill having been simply read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Does the Chair hold that there is no objection? It seems to me the right reserved by the Senator from South Dakota was an objection to the bill, in case he has the right to object.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object until I know more about it. I will object finally now if there is any question about it.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has a right to object at any time.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. WARREN. I did not understand the Senator from South Dakota to object to the bill at this stage, but he reserved the right to object to it after it had been fully read if he should choose to do it. The bill has only been partly read. The amendments have not yet been stated.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understood that was the intention of the Senator from South Dakota, but I understood the Chair's ruling to be that that was not an objection and that the bill is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota reserved the right to object, the Chair understands, later in the consideration of the bill. There was no objection to its present consideration.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not know about it. I supposed the Senator from South Dakota did not object to it.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will withdraw his present objection.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to hearing the amendment, and I presume that I may object later on. With that understanding, I will withdraw my definite objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Now let the amendments of the committee be first read, so that we may know what they are.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; let the amendments of the committee be read.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let them be reported and not acted on now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 2, line 5, after the word "Claims," insert "or for such other purposes as may be determined;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, empowered and directed to acquire for and in the name of the United States, for the purpose and in the manner hereinafter provided, the following-described real estate, with the improvements thereon, known and designated as original lots Nos. 5, 6, 7, and 8 in square 167, in the city of Washington, D. C., and containing 17,733 square feet, lying and being at the corner of Pennsylvania avenue and Seventeenth street NW., fronting on Pennsylvania avenue 100 feet and on Seventeenth street 160 feet, and being the property of the Corcoran Gallery of Art. Said property to be used by the Court of Claims, or for such other purposes as may be determined.

In section 2, page 2, line 9, before the word "thousand," strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty-two," and in line 10, before the word "dollars," strike out "five hundred;" so as to made the section read:

SEC. 2. That the said Secretary is authorized and directed to acquire said property by purchase from the owners at and for a sum not exceeding $332,500, or by condemnation proceedings conducted in accordance with the terms of an act approved June 25, 1890, to provide for an eligible site for a city post-office in the city of Washington, D. C., with amendments thereto, approved August 30, 1890.

Section 3, page 2, line 16, before the word "thousand," strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty-two;" and in line 17, before the word "dollars," insert "fifty;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the sum of $332,500 is hereby appropriated for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

On page 2, after line 18, insert the following new section:

SEC. 4. That so much of the act entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a building for the Department of Justice," approved March 3, 1879, as provides "that said building shall be constructed so as to provide a court room and necessary accommodations for the Court of Claims," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. COCKRELL. In other words, this simply makes a purchase of the old Corcoran Art Building for the use of the Court of Claims, now located in it, and the bill, as amended, proposes to appropriate not exceeding $332,500, but leaves it subject to condemnation. My amendment is in section 1, line 5, to strike out the words "and in the manner," so that it will read "for the purpose hereinafter provided;" then at the end of line 6 to insert "or for other purposes, as may be determined: Provided, That the same can be secured for a sum not exceeding $332,500;" and then to strike out the whole of the section authorizing condemnation proceedings; so that if they will sell the building for a sum not greater than $332,500, the purchase can be made; but if they do not, that there shall be no condemnation proceedings. I think that is a fair price for the building, and that it is sufficient. I believe the Court of Claims ought to have a separate building.

Mr. WARREN. I am willing to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to inquire where this bill comes from, what is the necessity for it, and who owns the real estate?

Mr. WARREN. The real estate is owned by the Corcoran Art Gallery Association, and it is desired by the Department of Justice for the use of the Court of Claims, now occupying it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Is the bill recommended by the Department of Justice?

Mr. WARREN. It is.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It seems to me we ought to have some plan in regard to the construction of additional public buildings in this city for the accommodation of the Government offices, and that plan ought to involve the beautifying of the city as well as the construction of suitable buildings. In other words, I do not think we ought to buy a corner here and a corner there, without reference to any definite plan as to the improvement or the development of the city. We ought to have some systematic plan which would result, as I very much hope, in some steps being taken to secure the south side of Pennsylvania avenue for the purpose of erecting there public buildings with proper space between them, so that they will be examples of art as well as of utility. We ought to profit by the example of some of the other cities of the world who have pursued such a policy, and have thereby contributed something to art as well as to the necessary conveniences for carrying on the business of government.

It seems to me that the purchase of the ground for the location of the Attorney-General's Office was a mistake. The area is too small, and it is surrounded by other tall buildings, so that we can not construct a building there that will be a thing of beauty.

It seems to me the Post-Office building which we have constructed on Pennsylvania avenue was a mistake for the same reason. We ought to have had more space about it, with parking and trees surrounding it. Such things would add to the appearance of the building and would beautify Pennsylvania avenue. Instead of doing this we have built a barn, a sort of barracks, for the Post-Office Department. It seems to me the building ought not to have been constructed so as to cover the entire space.

Without following any well-developed plan, we are continually buying such real estate as people want to sell to the Government, thus ultimately making the city ugly, and making it so that we shall at some time want to remove the capital from it, if such a policy shall be continued.

That is why I object to this bill. I do not think there is any reason why this particular locality should be purchased. Perhaps it may contribute to the success of the Corcoran Art Gallery, and that is the only possible consideration I can see for it. It seems to me the space desired is too small. We ought not to construct these public buildings and expend vast sums of money upon them, upon spaces smaller than perhaps a whole block; and we ought not perhaps to erect public buildings on a space as small as a whole block where we can not secure proper surroundings.

Mr. WARREN. I agree to very much, in fact about all, the Senator has said. But this is the situation as to this proposed purchase: We are in possession of the ground and have heretofore made an appropriation to erect a building for the use of the Department of Justice. Neither the piece of ground nor the proposed building are large enough to accommodate the Department of Justice, including the Court of Claims. It is true, as the Senator has said, that the spaces are not always large enough, and it is to relieve us from that situation in this particular Department that it is proposed to buy the old Corcoran Art Gallery for the use of the Court of Claims, so that we may not be compelled to add, at far greater expense, more ground and a larger building in that particular block, which has been heretofore secured for the Department of Justice. I agree with the Senator about securing full blocks and about improving the south side of Pennsylvania avenue, and I am ready to join with him in the building up of the city in such a proper way as he suggests.

It used to be said to us when we were children, "You can not eat your gingerbread and sell it, too." This, however, is an opportunity to accomplish just that thing. The Government buys this building and ground at a less figure than we could get similar property for in any other part of the city. And then the public—the Government, I may say—gets the benefit of every dollar of the money so paid out, because it is to be expended in enlarging and perpetuating the Corcoran Art Gallery School, which is kept open as a day and night school to everybody who desires to attend, as well as in purchasing additional works of art to add to the present magnificent collection which is a pride to the city and to the country.

As I said before, the lots upon which we are to erect a building for the Department of Justice will furnish room enough to take care of that Department if we provide for the Court of Claims as proposed in this bill. Then we can go on in the line the Senator has indicated in any further buildings to be erected.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The ground which we have secured for the Department of Justice is admittedly not sufficient, and therefore we must add another piece admittedly not sufficient in order to make two bad jobs instead of one. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the consideration of the bill, and it goes over.

NEW YORK PRINTING EXPOSITION.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I ask leave to make a report at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CARTER. I will yield to the bill of the Senator from Colorado, which I hope will be the last.

Mr. TELLER. A joint resolution came from the House of Representatives authorizing the exhibit of Government relics at the New York Printing Exposition, from May 2 to June 2, 1900. It has passed the other House. The people connected with that printing exposition are exceedingly anxious to have the joint resolution passed at an early date, because the time is short. It has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and I am directed by that committee to report it back favorably without amendment. I ask unanimous consent that it may now be considered and put upon its passage. The whole matter is in the discretion of the executive department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution reported by him, which will be read in full for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 235) authorizing the exhibit of Government relics at the New York Printing Exposition, from May 2 to June 2, 1900; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it was not my purpose to further address the Senate with reference to the controverted matter proposed by the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]. The course of the discussion upon yesterday afternoon, however, seems to render necessary the placing in logical sequence and in regular order of the various facts and circumstances leading up to the present controversy.

To begin with, the preparation of the Alaskan code has been a work of continuous and heavy labor. The Committee on Territories devoted much time to the preparation of this code, consisting of three titles, over 600 pages, and in the neighborhood of 2,000 sections.

Numerous persons appeared before the committee from time to time, claiming to have been in Alaska or to be interested in Alaskan affairs. Persons representing the interests which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] so fervently urges here today were before the committee and in almost constant attendance, and appeared by attorney and in person. I can not perceive any impropriety in that, nor do I mention the fact that the interest which opposes this amendment was represented before the committee by attorneys. It is eminently proper that persons having interests in Alaska should appear before the committee having in charge the legislation relating to that district.

The bill was finally reported to the Senate, read, and placed before the Senate for amendment. The Senator from North Dakota challenged the wisdom and justice of section 73 of Title III of the bill. I am free to say that at the time he drew attention to that section it had not challenged my attention as calculated to confirm shady or doubtful titles or to give rights where none existed under the law. It seemed to me when he drew attention to the section, however, that it should be stricken out, and, further still, that section 72 had no place in the bill.

Mr. TELLER. What section did the Senator say?

Mr. CARTER. Sections 72 and 73, Title III, of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. On what page of the bill are they?

Mr. CARTER. On page 469. The two sections objected to, which appeared in the bill as reported to the Senate, read as follows:

SEC. 72. Any alien may acquire and hold lands, or any right thereto or interest therein, by purchase, devise, or descent, and he may convey, mortgage, and devise the same, and if he shall die intestate the same shall descend to his heirs; and in all cases such lands shall be held, conveyed, mortgaged, or devised, or shall descend in like manner and with like effect, as if such alien were a native citizen of the district or of the United States; and any corporation incorporated under the laws of any State in the United States or of any foreign country not prohibited by law from carrying on business in the district may acquire, hold, use, and dispose of, in the corporate name, all real estate necessary or convenient to carry into effect the object of the incorporation and the transaction of its business, and also any interest in real estate, by mortgage or otherwise, as security for moneys due to or loaned by such corporation.

SEC. 73. The title to any lands heretofore conveyed shall not be questioned nor in any manner affected by reason of the alienage of any person from or through whom such title may have been derived.

In conjunction with this objection the Senator from North Dakota presented me a communication dated May 25, 1899, addressed to the President of the United States, which has been printed in part, but not entirely. I wish to have that read as a part of my remarks.

Mr. SPOONER. What is that?

Mr. CARTER. It is a communication addressed to the President of the United States, which will explain itself, and which has been, as I have said, partly printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the paper.

Mr. TILLMAN. I inquire what is the document which the Senator is having read?

Mr. CARTER. This is a petition which the Senator from North Dakota presented to me at the time he made his objection to section 73, to which I have referred.

Mr. TILLMAN. How comes it that it was sent to the President of the United States; and if it was, why did it not get to him?

Mr. CARTER. I presume that the President of the United States referred it, as such matters are generally referred, to the appropriate Department. Just how it was referred I do not know; but it is a matter which ought to have received the attention of the President, and I suppose has received his attention in so far as the Executive action could reach the situation.

Mr. TELLER. It was referred to a committee here for legislative action?

Mr. CARTER. It was handed to me by the Senator from North Dakota in conjunction with his objection to section 73, to which I have referred.

Mr. TILLMAN. I just wanted to know how it got here.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, I will state as a fact that this statement was printed as a part of Senate Document 272.

Mr. CARTER. As I have already stated, the paper was printed only in part; and I desire, if there be no objection, to have it read in full.

Mr. STEWART. I hope close attention will be paid to it, as I think it will be shown that none of the people who signed it speak of their own knowledge.

Mr. CARTER. I trust it may be received for what it is worth, at any rate.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he knows the distance of that locality, Council City, from Cape Nome by the ordinary route of travel?

Mr. CARTER. I am not able to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. STEWART. I understand it is between 150 and 200 miles.

Mr. CARTER. The paper, I think, is self-explanatory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the paper will be proceeded with, if there be no objection.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading. The paper is as follows:

COUNCIL CITY, ALASKA, May 25, 1899.

To His Excellency the President of the United States.

SIR: Your relator would respectfully represent and show to Your Excellency the following, upon the information and belief of the members of this association and upon the information and belief gained from the statements of other reliable and reputable citizens, viz:

First. That we are located and residing on the banks of the Neukluk River, a tributary of Fish River, about 50 miles north from Golovin Bay, on the north shore of Norton Sound, Territory of Alaska.

Second. About the 25th of April, 1898, gold was discovered in this section by a party of four men, consisting of A. P. Mandaunt, H. L. Blake, D. B. Libby, and L. F. Melsing. The report of such discovery was not fully circulated until late in the summer of 1898, and during that fall about 100 people came in and are wintering here. Since then rich discoveries of gold have been made in the surrounding country, notably in what is now known as the Cape Nome mining district, on the eastern shore of the Bering Sea. We believe these discoveries will attract from 5,000 to 10,000 people, and probably more, to this section between this and the 1st of the coming October.

Third. That five mining districts have been organized, viz, El Dorado, Discovery, Bonanza, Blake, and Cape Nome districts. In these districts some 2,000 mining claims have been located by the original 100 and other people who have come in from the Yukon and other places during the winter—probably 300 altogether.

Fourth. That the aforesaid H. L. Blake and one N. O. Holtberg made the first discovery of gold during the summer of 1898, in what is now known as Cape Nome mining district, and afterwards imparted the information of such discoveries to their supposed friends, H. P. Anderson and H. E. Carlson, the Swedish missionaries, respectively, at Golovin Bay and Unalaklet, and it was agreed between them that they would return to said district together at a later date and organize a mining district. The aforesaid missionaries, disregarding their promise, secretly and clandestinely and unknown to the said Blake, organized a party consisting of E. Lindbloom, E. Linderberg (who is employed by the United States Government in the care of the reindeer station at Eaton), W. C. Price, and E. N. Kittelsen, and 12 Laplanders (whose names are unknown) in the United States Government employ, and sent them to Cape Nome to locate mining claims in the aforesaid Cape Nome mining district and organize the same, and they did so locate many claims and organize said district. That at such meeting to so organize said district there were present 4 white men and 2 Laplanders, or "half-breeds," who were not citizens. That at such meeting a by-law (so called) was passed allowing one person to locate placer-mining land and lode claims as agent for another by power of attorney, and since then hundreds of claims have been located by power of attorney for persons absent; and such powers of attorney have been recorded, together with the notice of the locations made thereunder, and the persons making such locations are now claiming said lands as bona fide locations.

Fifth. That a large number of the so-called powers of attorney under which the aforesaid locations have been made and so recorded are fraudulent, the same never having been signed by the persons by whom they are purported to be signed, but were written out and the names of the principal and witnesses thereto forged to such powers of attorney. In many instances locations would be made during the day and the powers of attorney written out and the signatures forged thereto to fit and correspond with the locations made during the day. That the greater part of the powers of attorney so used in locating are signed by the principal and two witnesses, but such signatures were never acknowledged before any officer competent to take and certify acknowledgments, and were never stamped with United States internal-revenue stamps, as required by law. Your relator believes that all so-called powers of attorney are illegal and incompetent, and any locations made thereunder of the United States mineral lands illegal and void and are fraud. Your relator also believes that it is the intention of many of the persons so making such illegal locations under fraudulent and incompetent powers of attorney to hold possession of the land and mine the gold therefrom without paying the United States Government therefor in good faith, as provided and intended by law.

Sixth. That it is the belief of many persons that the law does not give the right to locate and claim the public mineral lands of the United States to an individual acting through or by an agent by power of attorney, and they are desirous of contesting such right in a court of competent jurisdiction. And your relator further believes that the only court of competent jurisdiction in Alaska to try and adjudicate such question and the question of land and mineral rights therewith under the law of May 17, 1884, is the United States district court at Sitka, which is some 1,500 to 1,700 miles distant from this location and is, by reason of the rigorous climate, wholly inaccessible for the nine winter months and almost so during the three summer months, by reason of the distance and poor and irregular means of communication with Sitka, where said district court is held.

Seventh. That one Lieut. E. S. Walker, of Company —, Eighth Regiment, is in command of the military forces of the United States at St. Michaels, in said Territory, and of the military reservation under control thereof. That the said E. S. Walker has actively engaged in locating mining claims himself and by having agents locate the same for him by powers of attorney, and he now owns and claims and is interested in a large number of locations of claims so located (nearly all of them being located by agents), a list of which claims he owns or is interested in in El Dorado and Discovery mining districts is attached hereto and made a part hereof. Relator is informed and believes that he is also largely interested in many claims in other districts, the title to which is in question, and are of the same nature.

Eighth. That one L. B. Sheppard is the United States commissioner for the Territory of Alaska and for the district of St. Michaels, and as such is also ex officio justice of the peace, with the jurisdiction and powers conferred by the Oregon statutes where not in conflict with the United States law, and the said Sheppard has also actively engaged in locating mining claims by agents, by powers of attorney, and now owns and claims and is interested in a large number of claims so located; that the said Sheppard is also interested in a large number of claims located by Laplanders, who are in the employ of the United States Government, caring for its reindeer, and are under contract to be returned to Lapland at the expiration of five years from the date of said contract; that Laplanders are of the Mongolian race and are prohibited from claiming and locating the public mineral lands of the United States. A list of the claims in which the said Sheppard owns or is interested in El Dorado and Discovery mining districts is hereto attached and made a part hereof. The said Sheppard is also interested in a large number of claims in the other districts, the title to which almost wholly rests upon the question of the validity of locations by powers of attorney.

Ninth. That persons believing such locations, in many instances, to be illegal and void, and in other cases fraudulent, and being desirous of contesting the same in a court of competent jurisdiction have, in several instances, relocated the ground so attempted to be located fraudulently.

Tenth. That the said E. S. Walker and L. B. Sheppard, upon learning of such action, as your relator is informed, became fearful of losing a large number of their claims, and knowing of the isolation, the difficulty of the people here to reach Sitka, where the district court is held, conspired together and agreed between themselves and a certain number of the claimants whose supposed rights were to be contested, that the said Sheppard, acting as a justice of the peace under the Oregon statutes, would assume to have jurisdiction to try and pass upon the question of the right of an individual to locate the public mineral lands of the United States by an agent by power of attorney and to try the questions of land and of mining rights mixed therewith, and that a number of suits were to be commenced by said claimants involving such questions, and that he (Sheppard) would, as judge in such cases, decide that locations so made were legal, and thereupon give judgment for the plaintiffs, and that if defendants in any way disobey the judgment of said court so given, then the military forces of the United States under command of the said E. S. Walker would arrest and imprison any person so disobeying the action or judgment of said court; that under pretense of accommodating the litigants in such actions the said court was to be held at Golovin Bay, about 200 miles from St. Michaels at which place some of the "to be" plaintiffs resided. As an excuse that the United States military forces should appear at that place, it was arranged that a petition should be circulated and signed.

Accordingly such petition was prepared by those interested and secretly circulated and signed. But some six or seven persons signing knew of it in Council City (where there were about 125 people), the other signers residing at Golovin Bay and other places distant from the mine. In response to said petition so prepared as agreed among themselves, court was to be held at Golovin Bay. And during the latter part of January or the first part of February, 1899, the said E. S. Walker caused to be posted throughout the different districts notices announcing that L. B. Sheppard would hold court at Golovin Bay on or about March 5, 1899. And about that day he did so appear at that place, accompanied by a squad of seven soldiers under command of Lieut. O. L. Spaulding, jr., and on March 7, 1899, suits were commenced at that place in Sheppard's court by H. P. Anderson vs. O. J. Comtois, N. O. Holtburg vs. A. P. Mordaunt, J. L. Hagelin vs. J. L. Wilson, and the appearance of said defendants was fixed for March 20, 1899.

Different questions of law and fact were at issue in said actions, and the question of the right to locate public mineral land of the United States by agent and by power of attorney, and rights to land and of mining rights were involved in all said actions. The trial thereof lasted from March 20 to March 23, and all three actions were at once decided by said Sheppard in favor of the plaintiffs aforesaid. Defendants requested a jury to try said actions, which was denied by the court. And during said trials every motion or objection made by plaintiffs' counsel was granted or sustained, and every motion or objection made by defendants was overruled or denied. It was remarked by all present, except those interested with plaintiffs, that the trials were a "farce."

The following will illustrate the general proceedings on said trials: Defendants filed an affidavit setting forth that the judge (Sheppard) was interested and disqualified to try issues involved, on the ground that he was personally and largely interested in the result of the trials by reason of his holding a large number of mining claims, the titles to which would be affected by his decision on the questions involved in the case before him, and attached as "exhibits" powers of attorney given by himself and his stepdaughter; that he held a large number of mining claims located thereunder, etc., the titles to which would be made good if his decision in said actions was given to plaintiffs, etc. He was slow, or did not seem to know what form of order to make. When plaintiff's attorney spoke up and said, "Judge, you want to make an order overruling that motion or objection," the judge responded by saying, "Yes; I overrule this motion."

While the said Sheppard was in Cape Nome mining district, a few days previous to said trial, he informed a gentleman there that he would decide the case of Anderson vs. Comtois in favor of plaintiff, Anderson; and also previous to said trials, and while at Golovin Bay, he said to another gentleman that "he had come over to stop claim jumping," as he called it. Immediately upon the conclusion of said trials Lieut. O. L. Spaulding, jr., called all the aforesaid defendants and one L. F. Melsing into his private room and informed them that if they or any of them did not respect and obey the decision and judgment of the court in said actions he would arrest and confine them in the guardhouse and that he would arrest and confine any person hereafter who "jumped" a claim, and shortly afterwards, on the same day, to wit, on March 23, 1899, did arrest and confine one L. F. Melsing, and next morning, on March 24, 1899, he arrested and confined one "Jack" Watterson, and conveyed them to St. Michael, where they are still under arrest and confinement, so relator is informed.

Both of said persons are respectable and law-abiding citizens and large property owners, and were, at the time of their arrest, quietly attending to their own affairs at Golovin Bay and had in no way committed any crime nor in any way broken the peace. Such arrests were made without any charges being placed against them, and relator is informed that no charges have been placed against them. Each had before located a piece of land that had been attempted to be located by a Laplander, and which they believed was fraudulent, and they desired to contest his location thereof in the civil courts. At the time of arresting said Melsing, Lieut. O. L. Spaulding, jr., said to him: "If you will see Sheppard and arrange that matter with him, and either give him a bill of sale or abandon your claim to that land, I will release you; otherwise I will keep you under arrest." Mr. Melsing declined to do this. That was the only reason given for his arrest. The arrest of both of these parties was wholly without cause and without charges being preferred against them, and such arrest and detention by an officer of the United States Army was an outrage upon the rights of law-abiding citizens.

Eleventh. That during the time that the said L. B. Sheppard was at Golovin Bay he and one N. T. R. Hatch, attorney for the aforesaid plaintiffs, lived at the house of Plaintiff H. P. Anderson (and slept in the same bed), where the other plaintiffs were also, and they, together with Lieut. O. L. Spaulding, jr., and other friends of plaintiffs, were in almost constant consultation.

Twelfth. That to the trial of said actions it was common rumor in the community, and defendants were informed by different persons who were in a position to know the facts that it was arranged that they were to be "railroaded" by the court and judgment given against them, and they then to be arrested by the soldiers if they in any way disobeyed the said court.

Thirteenth. That we believe the aforesaid proceedings were had by said officers to prevent citizens from contesting the questions in the proper courts by which the said officers as aforesaid and said plaintiffs are holding many and valuable tracts of Government mineral lands, they knowing full well the difficulties which citizens would have to encounter in reaching the proper courts, and hoping thereby that no contest would be made and they would thereby be enabled to hold their lands.

Fourteenth. That on or about the 15th of October, 1898, the aforesaid A. N. Kittelsen commenced an action against one Harry Campbell before said L. B. Sheppard, acting as a justice of the peace, and in such action the said Sheppard, contrary to law, issued a writ of injunction prohibiting the said Campbell from working his mining claims, and the said Campbell having no means of defending said action, and being ignorant of the law himself, was unable to defend the same and thereby caused great damage.

Fifteenth. That the said L. B. Sheppard is in the employ of the North American Trading and Transportation Company at St. Michael, and has at various times sold intoxicating liquors to the Eskimo and white men in violation of the law, and while so holding the office of United States commissioner and justice of the peace.

Wherefore your relator would respectfully ask that the said L. B. Sheppard be removed from the office of United States commissioner as aforesaid, and that such legal proceedings be instituted against him as provided by law; also,

That the said E. S. Walker be removed from the office of captain in the United States Army, and such other proceedings be instituted against him as the law and Army Regulations provide in such cases; and that Lieut. O. L. Spaulding, jr., be removed from office, etc.

That a United States land district be created for this section or portion of the district of Alaska, and that a register and receiver be appointed therefor, with their office at Anvil City, Alaska.

That your excellency recommend to Congress the passage of a code of laws for the district of Alaska; also providing for the creation of a judicial district for this section or portion of the district of Alaska, and the appointment therefor of a United States district judge to hold court and reside at Anvil City, Alaska.

J. L. WILSON,
President Law and Order League.
A. P. MORDAUNT,
Secretary.

EXHIBIT A.

Mining claims belonging to Capt. E. S. Walker, or in which he is interested, viz:

In El Dorado district, on Ophir Creek.—No. 19, above E. S. Walker; No. 1, below Sandallius; No. 2, below J. Kennedy; No. 3, below ——— Rielly.

In Discovery district, on Melsing Creek.—Rielly, Sandallius, Atchison, E. S. Walker.

We had an original list made in the handwriting of Capt. E. S. Walker, showing the above 4 claims on Ophir Creek, and 12 claims in Discovery, making 16 claims altogether. The original list has been lost, and this has been made up from memory to partially substitute it. He is also interested in many claims in the adjoining districts.

EXHIBIT B.

List of claims in El Dorado and Discovery mining districts, which L. B. Sheppard owns, controls, or is interested in, viz:

Claims on Melsing Creek.—Harry Buggee, Jim Dodson, D. H. Hall, J. H. Bush, J. G. Barrett, E. E. McGavacks, Ed. Fallon.

Claims on Ophir Creek.—Ed. Fallon, E. McDavick, J. H. Bush, J. H. Bouse, Joseph Domes, J. G. Barrett, J. H. Hall, Harry Buggee, L. B. Sheppard, S. Ivanhoff, S. L. Hansbrough.

Claim on Neukluk River.—S. L. Hansbrough.

The following claims on Proxy Creek (but by some oversight the location notices were not presented to the recorder in time): B. B. Earle, E. S. Echols, H. Buggee, J. G. Barrett, E. E. McGavack, J. P. Agnew, E. H. Hanson, Joseph Domes, J. H. Bush, J. H. Hall, J. W. Wilson, Ed. Fallon, W. S. Lane, L. B. Sheppard, W. M. Kidston, J. A. Greeham, Ed. Josle, E. Maynard, Harry Shalman, J. H. Buise.

At the foot of the list Mr. Sheppard makes the following note:

"Also some claims located by Mr. Hansbrough. Mr. Libby knows about this. L. B. S."

LAW AND ORDER LEAGUE, Council City, April 10, 1899.

We, the undersigned signers, being residents of Council City, Alaska, do associate ourselves together under the name of the Law and Order League.

The purposes and objects of the formation of this league are the enforcement and support of the law by all lawful and regular means; to prevent crime and preserve peace and good order in the community; protect the rights of its members and all law-abiding citizens.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it has been suggested in the course of the debate that the gentlemen, fifty in number, who signed this protest or who constitute this law and order league, are disreputable, and that the only really reputable people in that country are the few Laplanders and aliens who have not declared their intention to become citizens of the United States. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] urged that action by Congress confirming the title to the public domain in persons who had sought to acquire the title in the manner outlined in this protest or petition was not in accordance with fair dealing or good public policy.

These petitioners merely requested the privilege of being allowed to go into a court of justice. They requested that a court be established: they requested that a land office be established, to the end that their rights might be legally and regularly asserted. I do not pretend to say—indeed, I am loath to believe—that an officer of the United States Army, in collusion with Mr. Sheppard, the commissioner, proceeded, as outlined in this protest, to hold a court, deny a trial by jury, and adjudge the rights of these persons according to the interest of the court and the interest of the Army officer. There was, of course, no jurisdiction in the justice of the peace to try the title to the land. There was no right in common decency for this justice of the peace to entertain jurisdiction for a moment longer than was necessary to transfer the cause when these defendants set up the fact that he was directly and largely interested in the outcome of the suit. But it seems that notwithstanding the protest of the defendants, notwithstanding the denial of the right of trial of the issue by a jury, the Army officer is said, after the judgment had been rendered in this farcical proceeding, to have sent out for these poor men and said to them, "Unless you obey this judgment and submit to it now, I will arrest you and bring you down and put you in the guardhouse."

Later on it was said that the officer, having made the arrest, said to the persons arrested, "If you will now go to Sheppard"—the court, the commissioner, the Pooh-Bah of the district—"and give him a bill of sale of this property, I will release you." Of course these were high-handed proceedings, but, as I have said, I am loath to believe that any officer wearing the uniform of the United States became a party to such proceeding. But the memorial proceeds to say, and the statement is vouched for by 50 men, that this Army officer and his superior were themselves interested in the subject-matter of the litigation.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Montana, if it will not interrupt him, whether he believes any Army officer was ever guilty of the transaction that the relator states on information and belief.

Mr. CARTER. Army officers have sometimes under circumstances proven recreant to duty.

Mr. STEWART. Do you believe it? I do not believe a word of it.

Mr. CARTER. I am, as I have stated, loath to believe that this officer was guilty of the charge here preferred; but the truth or the falsity of the charge is so easy of demonstration that it is scarcely to be believed that these men would make the statement unless they were prepared to support it by the proof.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire further of the Senator what on earth that has to do with the legislation proposed, if an Army officer or somebody else committed outrages, which I do not believe—this rigmarole? What has that to do with a bill to take one man's property and give it to another?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. RAWLINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if it be not true that a regularly called meeting of the miners at Cape Nome, while they were in session, was dispersed at the point of the bayonet by the soldiers of the United States under the command of one of these officers, and that after they had been driven out of the meeting and were upon the shore they were still pursued and dispersed? I have this from very reliable sources, and I ask the Senator if he has not information to that effect?

Mr. CARTER. Information has reached me similar to that which the Senator from Utah refers to.

This matter, so far as the Army of the United States is concerned, must be subjected to a most searching and thorough investigation. It will not answer any good purpose to palliate or cover up such gross misuse of the Army power in remote parts of our country. I can not believe that there will be a disposition anywhere to limit or defeat the purposes of an investigation looking to an ascertainment of the facts as the facts were brought into being from day to day in connection with this phenomenal find of gold.

The Senator from Nevada has suggested that he does not believe that an Army officer could have been guilty as charged by these memorialists. I sincerely hope that his unbelief may be verified by an investigation. That investigation will follow there need be no doubt, and the investigation will bring to these Army officers that just punishment which this outrageous conduct merits, if it is found that they are guilty as charged in this memorial.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Montana allow me to ask him a question right here? I will be very brief.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I see this memorial or petition is dated the 25th of May last. Has it ever been presented to the President? Is it addressed to him?

Mr. CARTER. I presume it has been.

Mr. NELSON. What action has the President taken in the matter?

Mr. CARTER. I understand that the officer who was there has been recalled, but what action is to be taken relative to proceedings by the War Department I am not advised. That proceedings should be taken either by the War Department or by Congress, to ascertain the truth of these charges, goes without saying.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask the Senator if, after the soldiers had broken up a meeting of the miners, they did not prohibit the organization of a miners' union among the miners at Cape Nome?

Mr. CARTER. I understand from numerous sources, and have been advised by persons in whose veracity I have the utmost confidence, that the soldiers of the United States, under the charge of this same captain, did at Cape Nome disperse an orderly meeting of American citizens convened for the purpose of enacting wholesome and needed rules and regulations for the government of that camp.

Further still, certain members of this union or meeting were subsequently taken to St. Michaels, a distance of one or two hundred miles, and there lodged in jail, without warrant or color of law, and detained there for an indefinite period of time. If, as a fact, this officer in his own person by and through the troops of the United States on duty there engaged in the work of locating mining claims, of making powers of attorney, of grasping all the surface of that country he possibly could, then it follows as the night the day that the unprincipled officer who would engage in the business would do anything necessary to bring about the success of his operation. I do not pretend to make the charge, but the facts will out in time, and if guilt exists the guilty man may now begin to tremble.

It seemed only fair, Mr. President, that these people thus outraged under alleged forms of law, thus beset by the authority of the Army, thus abused by an alleged court of justice, should appeal to the President, and that their petition, when it reached the Senator, should appeal to his sympathy and his sense of right and justice. It will not answer now to say these men are entitled to no hearing because they are blackmailers, they are scalawags, they are jumpers. They are American citizens, so they state, and it will be a dark and evil day for this country when the badge of American citizenship will not be at least as good a cloak for protection as the ancient citizenship of Rome was in the days of that republic. An American citizen must not be thrown into prison ruthlessly by the Army officers of the United States and then denied a hearing in the American Senate upon the theory that he is a scalawag, without a hearing of any kind or character,

Mr. President, in order to give these poor men an opening into the courts of justice, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], to his credit be it said, moved by a high sense of duty to a distant body of his fellow-countrymen, men on an ice-bound coast 8,000 miles away, introduced the amendment which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 73. That persons who are not citizens of the United States, or who prior to making location had not legally declared their intention to become such, shall not be permitted to locate, hold, or convey mining claims in said district of Alaska, nor shall any title to a mining claim acquired by location or purchase through any such person or persons be legal. In any civil action, suit, or proceeding to recover the possession of a mining claim, or for the appointment of a receiver, or for an injunction to restrain the working and operation of a mining claim, it shall be the duty of the court to inquire into and determine the question of the citizenship of the locator: Provided, That no location of a mining claim shall hereafter be made in the district of Alaska by any person or persons through an agent or attorney in fact, and all locations heretofore made by any person or persons through an agent or attorney in fact upon which $100 worth of labor or improvements had not been expended or made within ninety days first succeeding the date of such location are hereby declared to be null and void.

Mr. CARTER. Upon the presentation of that amendment to the Senate I felt called upon to say that in my opinion it went too far; that it proposed by legislation to affect conditions in existence and to declare null and void certain transactions which, if found in the court to be as stated, would be declared null and void by the court. But it did seem to me that one portion of the amendment was necessary to a fair determination of the rights of these miners and American citizens in Alaska—that is, to give unto them the right to go into the courts of justice and raise the question as the rights of the other parties to the suit. The reason for that position I will again briefly state.

Section 2319 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, adopted as a part of the mining bill in 1872, prescribes the qualifications of persons who may locate mining claims on the public domain. It reads as follows:

All valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and purchase, and the lands in which they are found to occupation and purchase by citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such, under regulations prescribed by law, and according to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same are applicable and not inconsistent with the laws of the United States.

In the Cape Nome mining country they could have no rules and regulations because it is alleged the Army of the United States dispersed the meeting. Now, under that statute a large number of cases were adjudicated, and these cases in the States and Territories held—

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether they did not adopt rules and regulations and locate their claims long before the alleged controversy about miners' meetings arose?

Mr. CARTER. I will be thankful to the Senator if, while citing these legal authorities, he will permit me to proceed in a somewhat logical order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana declines to yield.

Mr. CARTER. A long line of adjudications followed the enactment of this law. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] claims that it was never held in Colorado that an alien who had not declared his intention could not locate a mining claim.

Mr. TELLER. I will say to the Senator I did not say that. I said there was a very important case in the United States court that held that, but that the court of appeals overruled it, and subsequently the Supreme Court of the United States overruled it.

Mr. CARTER. That being conceded——

Mr. TELLER. I do not mean to say there may not have been such an adjudication in the State. I mean to say, and he admits, that that is not the law now and has not been for many years.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator's statement relieves me from the necessity of reading from the Colorado authorities, and indeed——

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator that I suppose it was considered the rule of law between the time the United States court decided it and the time the court of appeals upset it, because that really was the court that tried our mining claims, and that was the court to which we looked for the law. For a time undoubtedly that may have been the rule.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. Will the Senator from Montana allow me?

Mr. CARTER. With pleasure.

Mr. PETTUS. I will be greatly obliged to the Senator if he will read his authorities. It may be satisfactory to the Senator from Colorado, but we would like to hear them.

Mr. CARTER. I will read, then, from the case of The Golden Fleece vs. Cable Consolidated Company, found in 12 Nevada, 312. It was held:

An alien who has never declared his intention to become a citizen is not a qualified locator of mining ground, and he can not hold a mining claim, whether by actual possession or by location, against one who connects himself with the Government title by compliance with the mining law.

In the case of The North Noon Day Mining Company vs. Orient Mining Company, in 1 Federal Reporter, page 522, it was held that—

Under the act of Congress of May 10, 1872, relating to the public mineral lands, none but citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such can acquire any interest to such lands by location.

In the case of Tibbets et al. vs. Ah Tong et al., found in 4 Montana, page 536, the supreme court of Montana held, in an opinion delivered by Wade, who was chief justice and one of the ablest jurists that ever presided on a bench in this country, as follows:

That the right to locate and the right to possess a mining claim go together; that they are part of the same grant, and neither can exist without the other. If, therefore, the grant by assignment or conveyance falls upon an alien incapable of making a location, his possession is of no consequence, the possession being transferred to one who under the statutes is capable of becoming a purchaser from the Government. Such possession, being part and parcel of the purchase, is illegal and is equivalent to an abandonment, and opens the ground to location and possession by any qualified person.

In the case of Bohanon vs. Howe (17 Pac. Rep., 583) the supreme court of Idaho held that—

Under the act of Congress of May 10, 1872, only citizens of the United States and persons who have declared their intention to become such can acquire any right of possession, by location or otherwise, of mineral lands on the public domain.

In Lee Doon vs. Tesh (8 Pac. Rep., 621) this doctrine is announced:

> Persons who are not citizens of the United States or have not declared their intention to become such, can not acquire any vested right to the possession of a mining claim on United States public lands.

In Morrison's Mining Rights, ninth edition, a text-book published by an eminent member of the Colorado bar, I find, on page 245, under the subtitle of "Ownership of possessory title," the following:

> The terms of the mining acts (A. C., section 2319) throw open the public domain for mineral location only to citizens of the United States and persons who have declared their intention to become such. An alien, therefore, can not locate a mining claim.

Numerous authorities are cited. But these authorities, as I have heretofore stated, extend through the whole jurisprudence of the mining States and Territories until this point was reached, to wit——

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me a question right there?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. If it is the law now that an alien acquires no rights, why does the Senator want this amendment?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, that question, in the light of what I am about to remark, will be fully answered.

Mr. STEWART. Why does the Senator want this amendment?

Mr. CARTER. In the course of time, after all these States had laid a solid foundation for their jurisprudence upon these established authorities, the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the rule—did not change the principle, but affected the remedy in this, to wit, it held that while an alien was not a qualified locator no power could raise the question of his right to possession except the sovereignty itself, the United States Government.

This rule of law laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States operates in practice to repeal the statutory provision of the act of 1872, which provides that none but citizens or persons who have declared their intention to become such may locate mining claims, the Government not being in position, with its multifarious business relations, with the numerous cases that are constantly arising, to institute inquest of office to ascertain who the trespassers on the public domain are. So that relegating the right to the Government defeats the purposes of the statute.

The amendment which I propose contemplates reaching this point, and I send it to the Secretary's desk to be read as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. Before that is read, I should like to ask——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CARTER. I desire to have the amendment read, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to say——

Mr. CARTER. I would be glad if the Senator later would reply. We only want light.

The SECRETARY. On page 469 strike out sections 72 and 73 and insert:

> That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as changing the existing mining laws of the United States, but in any suit, action, or proceeding hereafter commenced involving the validity of an unpatented mining location on the public domain any party alleging an interest in the subject-matter may put the competency of the locator in issue, and the court shall determine whether the locator was a citizen or had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States at the time the location was made.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Montana now allow me?

Mr. CARTER. I will conclude in a few moments, and I presume that I can get through more rapidly——

Mr. STEWART. I wish to call attention to a point as we are going along; that is all.

Mr. CARTER. I yield this time, with the understanding that the Senator will not do so any more.

Mr. STEWART. Very well. The Senator, as I understand, tells us that the Supreme Court hold that nobody can take advantage of the location of an alien but the Government; it must be office-found. It further holds, I would inform him, that if the alien declares intention it avoids forfeiture at any time. Now, upon that basis, that being law—and it has been the law for some years—when these investments have been made there is it fair to pass a retroactive law divesting title that is acquired under and in pursuance of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States? Would that be fair? His amendment is certainly retroactive. Is it not? It will apply to all cases wherever they are brought before the court. It will apply to the question arising in any cases, and I ask him if it will not disturb many titles in that country. Does he know that aliens have not located many of the claims that are now being worked all along in southern Alaska? I am told they have sold them, and it will be impossible to ascertain whether they were aliens or not.

Mr. CARTER. Has the Senator concluded his question?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; I have concluded the question, but I may have to make some remarks about it and explain it before the Senator will understand it. I shall do that after he gets through.

Mr. CARTER. I shall expect it and would be glad to have the remarks made.

Mr. TELLER. Later?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; later.

Mr. CARTER. Now, Mr. President, with reference to the Senator's question, somewhat well drawn out, but still intelligible, notwithstanding the wilderness of words surrounding it, we do not take from any person any right under this amendment that he now enjoys. We put the statute of the United States into active operation so that it may be invoked by anyone who is injuriously affected by a transgression of the terms of the statute.

It will be seen from the authorities I have cited (and these authorities might be supplemented by the score) that up to a recent date it was uniformly held in the mining States and Territories that a party to a mining suit could put the citizenship of the opposite party in issue and have the issue determined. I have tried, I will not say hundreds, but certainly many cases under the mining statutes of the United States, and up to the time the Supreme Court reversed this rule (the first time it was squarely reversed was in the case of Manuel against Wulff, which I originally tried, which was taken on appeal to the Supreme Court from the State of Montana, where we raised the question) it had been generally accepted as the settled law that any party to an action might put the citizenship question in issue and require that the party claiming a right under a location should show that he was qualified primarily to make the location. In contemplation of law that requirement exists now.

I realize that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], as likewise the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], will invoke on terms of what is known as the alien land act of 1897. The provisions of that act so far as they might affect a mining location by an alien have never been construed, as far as I know. There is no doubt that under the terms of the statute of 1897 if a title was originally acquired by a qualified person making a location, as was the case in the Manuel vs. Wulff case, and then a conveyance was made to an alien, the title would not lapse or the land become abandoned because it passed to the alien. The Supreme Court held that distinctly, and held further that in that case the alien having appeared on the day of the trial of the issue in open court to declare his intention to become a citizen of the United States the right would relate back to the date of the making a delivery of the deed or the location, if location had been made.

This amendment would only affect those persons who would refuse, when challenged, to come into court and declare their intention. It would not deprive any human being of a right now possessed. It would change the remedy by extending it to the citizenship of the country instead of confining it to the sovereignty itself, which is equivalent to a repeal of the alien part of the statute of 1872.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado meets this by saying these men who memorialize the President and whose memorial has become a part of the public records of Congress can not be heard in any court because he elects in a moment of temporary excitement to denominate them scalawags, claim jumpers, blackmailers. Grant it all for the sake of this argument, I say to the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], unjust and cruel toward these men as this language may prove, what is he to do with the vast army of American citizens who are now bound toward Alaska from all parts of the United States, going there hoping, with the mantle of their citizenship about them, to enjoy their birthright on the public domain.

Deny them the right to put in issue the capacity of a Laplander, or a Chinaman, of a Japanese, or a Korean, to hold a part of the mineral land of the United States? Yes; the Senator from Colorado would send them out there to meet all of Asia in open competition on land for which we paid money out of the Treasury of the United States, which is the common heritage of all the people of this country.

Mr. President, it will not answer for the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to come forward with a pitiful plea concerning the Laplanders from the ice-bound coast of Lapland, nor does it add much to say that their predecessors fought under Gustavus Adolphus, and that they are good Protestants, and therefore we ought to relax the laws.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Good Republicans.

Mr. CARTER. And good Republicans as well. I suppose they are sure of the here and hereafter in consequence of that combination. But, Mr. President, we have good Republicans and good Protestants who are American citizens or who have declared their intention to become such, and for their rights I insist just attention shall be given.

To the Senator from Minnesota I have freely said, if as a fact, in the absence of fraud, with good and honest intent, these Norwegians and Laplanders, with a mistaken sense of official power, went before the United States commissioner and declared their intention to become American citizens, we will cheerfully cure the defect which exists because of the incapacity of the officer before whom they appeared to receive the declaration. But in this demand for mere remedial legislation to affect a few there is no legitimate justification for throwing open the entire domain of Alaska to all the people of all the countries in the world without challenging their right, or giving anybody the power to challenge their right, to go in and contest the ground with our own people.

This is not retroactive legislation. From the day the alien made the location he knew that he was making it in violation of the statute of the United States, and the only question of concern to him is who shall raise the question of his right to hold it. He has no right.

But this amendment is made to operate as to actions commenced in the future. It does not relate to actions pending. The amendment is fair, it is just, and it leaves but one question for the Senate to determine: Will we, in the future, with the judgment of the Supreme Court in practical operation nullifying the terms of the statute by leaving the power in the Government alone to raise the question of citizenship, now meet the situation by providing that litigants in the future shall, as they have in nearly all the history of the past, raise the question of citizenship in the trial of their suits? It seems to me that this is a remedy of the right to assert a defense extended; it is not creating a new defense.

I do not wish to comment at length upon the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] yesterday evening: I have heard it said that sitting down the Senator is one of the mildest mannered gentlemen in the world; standing up he is one of the most ferocious. He had one of his ferocious streaks on hand yesterday evening. His better and calmer judgment, I am very happy to say, led him to eliminate from the RECORD some statements which I am glad I did not reply to yesterday evening. The position of the Senator from Colorado in this Chamber at this time is a position which any Senator may take without tarnishing him or justifying any man in questioning his motive. I will not proceed to name the men who have importuned me to take the same position. Speaking of lobbies, these poor fellows, bound in by the snow in Alaska, held by the ice of Bering Sea, are voiceless in this Capitol. They are just plain American citizens out on the frontier. The opposition to this amendment, and the demand for a ratification of these spurious and questionable titles, proceeds from the speculator who went into Alaska, rounded up these questionable claims, and now comes down here and wants us to turn them into ready cash. I for one do not believe in doing that. Let us have fair play for all hands.

The mineral treasures of this continent were discovered by a hardy, splendid, high-minded, worthy body of men. The Senator from Colorado can not for one moment outdo me in paying a tribute of respect to the men who on lonely mountain sides and down in the deep, dark recesses of caverns and canyons of the mountains have uncovered the wealth that has been pouring into the Treasury of the United States and to its people since 1849. They were the trail blazers. They penetrated the Rocky Mountains. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] knows the class of men they were. He was of them. They were not aliens. Those prospectors are not here asking that we shield them from question.

The Senator from Colorado speaks of the splendid camp at Cripple Creek, and I will guarantee him to-night that not a single alien ever located a claim at Cripple Creek, and no alien would be permitted to locate a claim in that mining camp. No Chinaman can locate a claim there and maintain himself. There is something in the imperial power of regulated public opinion which sometimes transcends the judgment of court and the written law itself.

But out in this icebound country of Alaska that splendid public opinion has not yet crystallized into such form as to make it effective. We, therefore, must put into the hands of our citizens the right to question the Chinaman and the Japanese and the Laplander who seeks to deprive them of their birthright, the right to explore and locate claims on the public domain of the United States.

I am for the American miner, Mr. President, whether he be a citizen or a person who has declared his intention to become such. As between these two classes and all the world I believe our duty is plain. We have nothing to give away to those people who think not enough of us or our institutions to declare their intentions to become citizens and to support the Government in the hour of its peril.

Not long ago the people of this country were given a lesson as to these vampires who come into and attempt to draw sustenance from the body of our people and the productiveness of the country. Along in the dark days of the war, both North and South, we found these fellows sneaking out, claiming that they were British subjects, or subjects of Russia, or some other country. After coming up and enjoying the splendid prosperity of the country until the day of trial came, they left us then to our fate, and took their goods away.

The man who will not declare his intention to become a citizen of the United States is not entitled to locate a mining claim on the public domain under the statute, and we should give every citizen of the country whose interest is injuriously affected by him the right to raise the question. That is all there is in this amendment.

Mr. SPOONER obtained the floor.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I wish to call attention——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the pleadings in this case. He has been trying so many cases outside of the pleadings that it seems very proper that we should take a little view of where we stand. In the first place, we have the affidavit of the recorder, Mr. Kittelsen, who is vouched for by Senators here as a gentleman of undoubted veracity. He makes a short affidavit as to the inception of these claims. He was not a hundred miles or two hundred miles away. He does not appear here as a relator; he does not tell a lot of sensational stories, for which nobody can vouch. He does not implicate Army officers or anything of that kind. There is no scandal in his affidavit. It is as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, City of Washington, ss:

Albert N. Kittelsen, M. D., being first duly sworn, on oath says that he is a citizen of the United States, and has been a resident of the Territory of Alaska since 1896; that he arrived at Cape Nome, Alaska, about October, 1898; that prior to that time there were three men located at Cape Nome; two of them were Swedes by birth, but had been in the United States some ten to fifteen years; the third was a Norwegian. Two other persons went there with me; one of them a Laplander and one an American citizen.

The Laplander had declared his intention to become an American citizen in the early spring of that year, and his declaration was filed before L. B. Shepherd, who was a United States commissioner at St. Michaels. The six persons who were then at Cape Nome located claims; some of them had located previous to our arrival. We then formed a mining district and adopted rules and regulations under the laws of the United States. I was elected recorder.

A few weeks after that miners from the surrounding country commenced coming in, and during the following winter the number rose to between 200 and 300. I recorded all their claims, and in every sense was recognized and acted as mining recorder. The first Laplander located three good claims—one for himself, one for his brother, and one for an associate, who arrived soon after and took possession and worked the claims. These Laplanders worked their claims during the working season of 1899, and sold out to Mr. Lane in the fall of 1899.

One Norwegian located claims on about six different streams and has been in possession of them ever since. The claims of these Laplanders, while they were in possession and working them, were located by other persons called "jumpers."

Later on the claims of the Norwegian were relocated by "jumpers" and recorded by me, because it was my duty to record all claims presented for recordation. I was so instructed by the judge of the district court.

In the summer of 1899 three lawyers located themselves at Cape Nome, whose names were Hubbard, Beeman, and Hume. These relocators, although they did not take possession or work upon the claims they relocated or "jumped," employed Hubbard, Beeman & Hume as their attorneys. Mr. Hubbard, of the firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, an attorney for the relocators, is in the city of Washington. I met him on the 5th of this month in the committee room of Senator HANSBROUGH.

I have no interest whatever in any of the "jumped" or relocated claims, either as original locator or relocator, and no private interest that would be affected by any of the proposed legislation.

ALBERT N. KITTELSEN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 6th day of April, 1900, at Washington, D. C.

[SEAL.] ELKANAH N. WATERS, Notary Public.

That is the truth from a man on the ground. He does not tell a lot of roundabout stories about military officers and such sensational stuff. He is not pleading in the interest of jumpers. I want to call attention to these pleadings. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] presented an affidavit here of a man by the name of Hubbard, of the legal firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume. He is one of the men who made up these pleadings. I read from the affidavit made by him:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, City of Washington, ss:

Oliver P. Hubbard, being duly sworn, on oath says that he is a citizen of the United States, an attorney at law, engaged in the practice of his profession at Nome City, in the Cape Nome mining district, district of Alaska, United States of America; that he first went to Alaska in the spring of 1898; that he is a member of the law firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, of Nome City, Alaska; that the members of the firm are Edwin R. Beeman, formerly a practicing attorney of Minneapolis, Minn., and William I. Hume, formerly a practicing attorney at Portland, Oreg., and this affiant, formerly a practicing attorney at Chicago, Ill.

Affiant says that the firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume are attorneys in a number of mining suits now pending in the United States district court for the district of Alaska; that among others are suits brought to recover the possession of certain mining claims alleged to have been staked by alien Laplanders; that these claims were located by American citizens in the months of November and December, 1898; that all of the alleged Laplander and alien locations were located by American miners in the fall of 1898 and the winter of 1898 and 1899; that among the miners who made such locations were Louis Melsing and John Waterson; that these two miners located claims on Anvil Creek, in said Cape Nome mining district, which, it is alleged, were theretofore located by Laplanders; that, on or about the month of March, 1899, Melsing and Waterson were arrested at Chenik, a point on Golvin Bay, and carried to St. Michael under arrest, the arrest having been made by the military authority, the troops being under command of Lieutenant Spaulding, who was acting under instruction from Capt. E. S. Walker, in command at Fort Get, etc.

Those are the men who located. Their affidavits will show that Mr. Lane bought some of these locations, and it was sought by lawsuits to take Mr. Lane's title, which was perfect. He had a right to buy them. Everybody understands that. A large amount of money had been expended, and the people who are represented here by Mr. Hubbard merely had their claims recorded. They have expended no money upon them; they discovered no mines. They could wait until after mines were worth millions of dollars, then have their pick of them, lie about mining camps, pick out the good claims, and try to find defects in the titles. They belong to a breed of jumpers who have infested every mining camp for the last fifty years. They would not relocate a poor claim. The Laplander, or whoever it was who found it, developed it and proved it to be valuable, and then they could record a notice; and their attorney comes here and claims that original locators were not American citizens.

Every one of them had attempted to declare his intention to become an American citizen, and this proceeding is to take advantage of the defect in the declaration of the Laplander, who went before the commissioner in good faith and supposed he had complied with the requirements of the law. That Laplander, even if he had not declared his intention to become a citizen, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States could now declare his intention and it would relate back. It is the law that an alien shall not be disturbed of his bona fide possession of real estate until office-found. That is not only national law but it is international law. Courts will not allow an alien to be robbed of his property. It is the universal law, as laid down by the Supreme Court and decided over and over again, that after suit is brought a party may declare his intention to become a citizen and the suit will abate. That was before the act of 1897, passed for Alaska, which in so many words declared that an alien might locate mining claims having title in that way.

Now it is proposed that if suit is brought, the question shall be presented to the court whether the original locator had a right to locate. That question can not now be raised. It ought not to be raised, and his citizenship ought not to be put in issue.

You can hardly imagine how far this will go. There are thousands of claims in Alaska. Undoubtedly aliens have located and sold their claims, and there are thousands of lawsuits that could be readily manufactured as to such cases. When a suit is brought a witness will come forward who will swear that he knew the man in Italy, and that he was an Italian; or he knew him in Germany, and he was a German; or he knew him somewhere else. Such a course would open all the titles in Alaska. The courts have never allowed such a thing to be done in all history, and no civilized country has ever allowed such a rule to prevail with regard to real estate. When the Government has sold the property of an alien the proceeds are awarded to the alien. The courts never disturb an alien in his property in any civilized country without returning him the proceeds or giving him an opportunity to sell.

Such harsh laws are against the spirit of the age; they are in direct conflict with the laws of the United States and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. If the policy now proposed should prevail in this case, it may be that a few hundred thousand dollars will be taken from those who have honestly bought the claims and are now working them.

I say the law should protect the men who discover claims. The gang who go around and file on them and record them are a pestiferous gang. They are not regarded in any community as good citizens, never have been, and never will be. The language of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was not strong enough in regard to that class of men. The community frowns on them; they are regarded as the worst of men. They go about and pick flaws in titles, make locations, and get up pestiferous litigation.

This is what Mr. Hubbard is here doing; and this roundabout story of the military officers and all that is gotten up by a man who is a relator and who makes his statement on information and belief. Who he is and what his responsibility is nobody knows. He does not state one word on his own knowledge. He states simply that he was there; that these claims were recorded, worked on, relocated, and records made. Such men, who never do any work upon the claims, now come here and ask Congress to change the law and to give them rights to which they are not entitled. I say we should not take the property of these men away from them.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] made, as is his wont, a very eloquent speech. It sounded well in the Senate, and it will read well in Montana and in the Western country. But I hope the Senator will not think me wanting in due deference to him if I say that the greater portion of that speech has little, if anything, to do, in my judgment, with the question before the Senate.

If any officer of the United States Army has perpetrated an outrage upon the miners in Alaska or elsewhere, I agree with the Senator from Montana that he should be dismissed the service. I am not ready, however—and I take it the Senate is not—to pass judgment of condemnation upon any officer of the United States Army without giving him a hearing. The men who sign this so-called relation or narrative or petition—there are but two who sign it—indict too many people, Mr. President. They charge upon one captain in the Regular Army a course of procedure which, if true, would put him not only out of the Army, but beyond the pale of decent association. They charge not simply that officer with fraud and oppression, but they charge another officer of the Regular Army with conspiracy and participation in the outrages which they recite.

That officer is a son of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Spaulding, of Michigan. I met him once. He looked like a gentleman and a soldier; and I have been told during this session of Congress and before this question arose in the Senate that he is a gentleman, as most officers of our Army are gentlemen. It will not do to ask the Senate to pass a condemnatory judgment on officers of the Army upon any such statement as this. These officers, however, can be investigated. I am in favor of an investigation; and if they have violated the law, if they have oppressed men in Alaska, they will be punished for it. That, however, has nothing to do with the question whether the Senate should adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], or the amendment, almost equally vicious, in my judgment, proposed now as a substitute for it by the Senator from Montana.

They charge also in that memorial, or relation, a large number of locations by fraud and through forgery. Mr. President, that statement may be true or it may be false. I think the Senator from Montana will agree with me that, if it be false, the remedy of the men who suffer from it is not to be sought in retroactive legislation by Congress, but can be found easily under the provisions of this bill in the courts to be established in that Territory. This bill provides for several courts in that Territory—not justices' courts, not courts held by commissioners, but courts held by judges appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, with all the jurisdiction requisite to enable them to make proper investigation, all of the parties being in court, and to render appropriate judgment, with the right of appeal to the losing party. I suppose the Senator from Montana will agree with me that if citizens of the United States attempt to locate claims fraudulently upon mineral lands, the parties litigating the validity of those claims have a right in any court to attack the validity upon that ground.

This question of the right of the individual to challenge the validity of location and title does not go at all to the question pending before the Senate. We give them courts; they are open to them, and if forged location papers have been made up there they will be set aside; if locations fraudulent in any way have been made they will be set aside, because fraudulent locations made by American citizens are not protected by the law any more than would be fraudulent locations made by aliens, if they are permitted by the law. It is not necessary in order to protect men in Alaska against forged powers of attorney, against fraudulent mining locations, that the Congress of the United States should change the law, and make it retroactive in a way not only to give undue advantage to litigants in such cases, but to deprive honest men, who have acted in good faith, of rights which ought to be protected. So that has nothing to do with the question before the Senate.

Nor was it necessary, although in its language it was eloquent, for the Senator to defend so warmly the motive of the Senator from North Dakota in proposing his amendment. I have heard no impeachment of his motive. It certainly never has entered my mind to doubt for a moment that he acted in perfect good faith. In what I have had to say and shall have to say against the amendment, I direct myself entirely to the merits of the proposition which he presents here, without in any way whatever suggesting or dreaming of any want of good faith upon his part in offering it.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana says he is for the American miner. He wishes to confine the power of location of mining claims to the American miner. That is a question of policy. It is a question certainly open to debate. It is a very large question, and the mere jingling of words about citizenship does not solve it or help to solve it. All American miners are not digging for gold in American territory by any means. Thousands of them have gone into Canada, into British Columbia; thousands of them are mining now in British Columbia, permitted there to mine as freely, and under the same conditions, as I understand, as the subjects of Great Britain are permitted to mine there; and it is a question, I think, which the Senate ought to consider—Canada being divided from us only by an imaginary line, thousands of our people having sought the gold fields there, and being permitted freely the same rights under their mining laws as are permitted to British subjects—whether we should enact now a law excluding all miners, including subjects of the British Empire resident in Canada, from locating and holding mining claims in the United States.

Millions upon millions of dollars have been invested by Americans in Canadian mines, which are being worked by them now. Senators ought not to forget that we can not expect the Dominion parliament or the governing body of any country to treat Americans with any greater liberality in respect to mining than we treat their subjects. We invite, by such a proposition as this, retaliation. It is hardly to be supposed for a moment, if we refuse permission by an act of Congress to Canadians to come into our territory and mine for gold, that they will leave open the door for American miners to go into Canada, into British Columbia, and mine for gold. It is too much to expect. The American miners interested in Canada are entitled to some protection, and I think there is danger that the Senator's proposition, if enacted into law, may very greatly injure American miners who are at work beyond our border. At any rate, it is worth considering.

We might limit this right, if we chose to do it, to the Canadians; we might exclude the subjects of other governments if we chose; but the proposition made by the Senator from Montana is at least worthy of consideration and worthy of some question in the minds of Senators.

But, Mr. President, what is this proposition? It is a proposition which, if I read it aright, is abhorrent to every fair-minded man and one not called for by anything in the situation so far as I have listened to the debate upon this bill. It is a proposition to enact retroactive legislation, which will affect the rights of men far away and unheard in this tribunal. Civilized legislatures are not in the habit of enacting such legislation.

The Senator from Montana says that his amendment takes away no right in any miner which now exists. I think the Senator is mistaken. I think his amendment does declare a new rule and does affect rights which it seems to me do exist. It provides—

That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as changing the existing mining laws of the United States—

I care nothing for that. I do not criticise that—but in any suit, action, or proceeding hereafter commenced—

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] read an affidavit or statement showing that a number of suits are now pending in which, under the law as it now stands, the complainant or the plaintiff, whatever the designation may be, is not permitted to challenge the title of a defendant upon the ground of alienage, that right under the decisions of the Supreme Court, and that right under the act of 1897, belonging solely to the Government. It was the common law of England. No one but the King had the right to challenge the alien's right or power to hold land. How easy it would be, changing the rule which now exists under the decisions of the Supreme Court and which now exist under the statute, even as to the controversies now pending, to withdraw those suits and bring them again, in which event they would be "hereafter commenced;" and we would in effect have enacted legislation, without looking into the merits of the pending causes, changing the rule of law as to pending cases, and perhaps, Mr. President, depriving men of rights which it certainly was not the purpose of Congress to deprive them of.

Nor is that all there is in the Senator's amendment. The Senator's amendment, as I understand it, takes away rights, if it be possible for Congress to do it, which now exist in more respects than one—in any suit, action, or proceeding hereafter commenced involving the validity of an unpatented mining location on the public domain, any party alleging an interest in the subject-matter may put the competency of the locator in issue, and the court shall determine whether the locator was a citizen or had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States at the time the location was made.

As I understand the law now, the alien ownership can only be challenged by the Government. That, I believe, is admitted by the Senator from Montana. That is repealed by this proposed amendment. As I understand the law now, and I think I can not be mistaken about it, if the Government in a suit to escheat upon the ground of alienage brings the claimant into court and it shall appear that the locator of the claim or the owner of the claim is an alien, there is not, of course, judgment of escheat, but the statute provides that the alien may declare his intention to become a citizen of the United States pendente lite; and if he shall declare his intention to become a citizen, it relates back and validates his claim and gives him an express statutory right to perfect his title even to patent. I think that is taken away by the Senator's amendment. I think it would be regarded as a repeal of that part of the act of 1897 which confers this right upon the alien owner of mining lands or of other lands in the Territories of the United States.

If this be a good rule to adopt, I ask the Senator from Montana why does he limit it to Alaska? Why is it proposed to leave the common-law rule declared by the Supreme Court of the United States and crystallized into the act of 1897 as to the alien ownership of land in force in all the Territories of the United States except Alaska?

Mr. CARTER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the amendment is applicable to the public domain, whether in Alaska or elsewhere.

Mr. SPOONER. If the amendment is applicable to the public domain, what business has it in a bill providing a civil code for Alaska?

Mr. CARTER. It meets the Senator's objection.

Mr. SPOONER. If a proposition revolutionizing the law of the United States, well considered, well safeguarded, liberal, and just, is to be enacted, why not bring it in here as an independent bill and let it be discussed upon its merits, freed from the environment which seems to surround the proposition which we consider here as an amendment to the Alaska bill? It has no business here, and no reason has been given why Congress should enact a rule upon this subject peculiar to Alaska or why Congress in the Alaska civil code should enact a change in the mining law applicable throughout all the Territories of the United States. I do not understand this attempt to legislate for all the Territories of the country in this civil code of Alaska.

That is not all there is to it. The act of 1897 provides that where the Attorney-General brings escheat proceedings challenging the right of an alien to hold land—mining or agricultural lands—as I said, he may perfect his title; he may qualify himself to hold, pending the suit, by declaring his intention to become a citizen of the United States. But that is not all. The act of 1897 provides that if he failed to declare his intention to become a citizen of the United States; if he preferred to maintain his allegiance to the Queen of Great Britain, if you please; if he was not willing to part with that allegiance in order to continue to hold the mining claim, it could be sold at public auction, not turned over to some jumper, not turned over to some adverse locator, but it should be sold at public sale and the proceeds of that sale, after deducting the expenses, should be paid over to the alien.

So, if he had discovered a mine, and if he had invested his money in it, if he had expended his labor upon it, if he had developed it so that it was of value, it should not be taken away from him at the suit of the Government of the United States simply upon the ground of alienage, but that if he were not willing to change his allegiance, he should cease to hold it; it should be sold under a judgment of escheat, and the money should go to him less the expenses. That is repealed by this proposed amendment, artistically drawn and simple apparently; and I know the Senator is perfectly sincere in his proposition about it.

There is another thing about this amendment. It says:

Had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States at the time the location was made.

That either means this or it means nothing: If, in the case it shall be determined that he has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States before he made the location, his location is void, taking away from him, as I have said before, this right to declare his intention subsequently and qualify himself to hold the land.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to call his attention to the fact that while the amendment purports to relate to suits commenced in the future, those suits may involve any location?

Mr. SPOONER. I was about to speak of that. It refers to suits hereafter commenced. I have already called attention to the fact that the suits now pending may be dismissed and hereafter commenced even in another form, and in that way entirely evade that part of the Senator's amendment.

Why should it apply to suits hereafter commenced to test the validity on this ground of locations made before the passage of the act?

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. The first proposition, the one made by him just prior to his last, is strictly correct. The language was intended to provide without quibble or question that a locator must, as a prerequisite to his right to locate a mining claim on the public domain of the United States, declare his intention to become a citizen, if an alien at the time, to give him a legal qualification to act.

With reference to the last proposition presented by the Senator relative to suits, unquestionably in suits hereafter commenced, locations heretofore made could be assailed under that amendment; but it must be borne in mind that two legal propositions exist. First, that the Government can now question the right. We extend the right to raise the question of citizenship. Second, that an alien locator can not, after another right has intervened, cure his location by declaration of intention.

Mr. SPOONER. If the act of 1897 ought to be repealed; if the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Wulff case ought to be overridden by statute——

Mr. CARTER. I will call the Senator's attention, if he will permit—I am thoroughly familiar with the Wulff case—to the fact that the Wulff case did not touch a location at all. In that case the locator was an American citizen. He conveyed his title to an alien; so that the location was properly made and initiated a title. The Supreme Court held that the fact of conveying to an alien would not be equivalent to an abandonment of the land, but in that case the grantee, admitted to be an alien, at the time of the trial in open court declared his intention to become a citizen, and the court held that he had a right to do so if no intervening right had occurred.

Mr. SPOONER. That does not change the situation at all. Does the Senator claim that to-day anyone other than the United States can challenge the validity of a location upon the ground of alienage?

Mr. CARTER. I think to-day it is a question whether it can be done by a citizen. The Wulff case did not clearly decide that point. It did decide that the conveyance to an alien was not an abandonment.

Mr. SPOONER. That I understand; but I understood the Senator to admit that in the present state of the law no one but the United States can challenge the validity of a location or an alien's right to hold land except the Government. If that were not true, this amendment authorizing anybody to challenge it would be a work of supererogation. That is true.

Now, what I complain of in connection with this amendment is this: If that ought to be the rule, if the decision of the Supreme Court ought to be overridden, if the act of 1897 ought in that particular to be repealed, let it be prospective and not retroactive. It is not fair where men, on the faith of that decision and on the faith of the invitation given by the act of 1897, have gone into the frozen regions of Alaska and located claims, faced dangers, and endured hardships, to repeal the law in that respect and take away from them the right they now have under the act of 1897 to save their claim and their labor and their money by declaring their allegiance to the United States. And yet that is what this amendment proposes to do. Make it prospective. Everyone is bound then to take notice of it, and no man can be misled. He may be mistaken, but he must take his chances on that. He can not be wronged. He will not have a fraud and an outrage perpetrated upon him by the Congress of the United States certainly.

The Senator read decisions as to the right of any alien to locate mining claims and to hold mining claims. I am not a mining lawyer, but I call the attention of the Senate again to the act of 1897, which is very clear:

That no alien or person who is not a citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in the manner provided by law shall acquire title to or own any land in any of the Territories of the United States except as hereinafter provided.

It is "hereinafter provided" as follows:

That this act shall not apply to land now owned in any of the Territories of the United States by aliens, which was acquired on or before March 3, 1887, so long as it is held by the then owners, their heirs or legal representatives, nor to any alien who shall become—

Not who shall become a citizen of the United States, but who shall become—a bona fide resident of the United States.

This is affirmative:

And any alien who shall become a bona fide resident of the United States, or shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in the manner provided by law, shall have the right to acquire and hold lands in either of the Territories of the United States upon the same terms as citizens of the United States.

But that is not all. There is something more "hereinafter provided." Here it is:

This act shall not be construed to prevent any persons not citizens of the United States from acquiring or holding lots or parcels of lands in any incorporated or platted city, town, or village, or in any mine or mining claim, in any of the Territories of the United States.

Could anything be plainer than that?

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAWLINS. That language is that nothing in that act shall be so construed as to prevent the persons indicated from holding mining claims. It does not say that nothing in other acts shall be so construed, does it?

Mr. SPOONER. No; it does not.

Mr. RAWLINS. If by other acts it is forbidden, then that would not give the right, would it?

Mr. SPOONER. Nothing of the kind intimated by the Senator from Utah is said in this act; and if anything of the kind was said in this act, it would, in my judgment, be an instance of unusual Congressional stupidity. If there was an act prior to the passage of this act of 1897 declaring that no alien should hold a mining claim in the United States, and Congress provides in a later act—

This act shall not be construed to prevent any persons not citizens of the United States from acquiring or holding * * * any mine or mining claim in any of the Territories of the United States.

That ought to be enough. It either means something or it means nothing.

Mr. RAWLINS. I submit this to the Senator: That phrase only imports, in every case in which it is used, that it is thereby not intended by the proposed special act under consideration to affect the general law as it then exists, and that clause would leave the rights referred to in that regard just as if the act had not been passed.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not so understand the law. In the first place it is an amendment of another act. In the next place it expressly says that an alien who shall become a bona fide resident may acquire and hold land under this act, and then it provides:

This act shall not be construed to prevent any persons not citizens of the United States from acquiring or holding * * * any mine or mining claim in any of the Territories of the United States.

And then it says:

SEC. 8. That all acts and parts of acts so far as they conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

It is either what it seems to be or it is a trap for the unwary. No man could read it without treating it as an invitation, so far as mining claims were concerned, so far as town lots and city lots were concerned, to aliens to acquire and hold them if they chose.

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will permit one other interruption, the general mining law throws open the mineral lands of the United States to exploration and location only to citizens of the United States, or those who have declared their intention to become such. That is a privilege limited to that class. Subsequently Congress deals with the rights generally of locating or acquiring and holding, and it says in respect to that act that nothing in it shall be so construed as to prevent the acquiring and holding of mining claims by certain classes of persons. It seems to me very clear that there is nothing in this latter act which is inconsistent with the limitation to the right of exploration. I understand the rule to be that this limitation in the general mining law is a condition precedent to the right to acquire any interest in mineral lands by original location.

Mr. SPOONER. When the alien land law was first passed, it was passed sufficiently broad in terms to exclude aliens altogether, and our friends from the mining States did not like that. They thought aliens ought not to be excluded. They wished aliens to be permitted to purchase, to bring their money here, to invest it here, to buy locations, to develop mines, to furnish work for men who wanted work, to increase the wealth of the country; and it was on their request, as I understand it to be historically true, that the alien land law was amended so as to provide that alien bona fide residents might hold lands and that they might acquire and hold mines.

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will permit me in that line, the original mining act was in the nature of a bounty, of course based upon the diligence and industry of citizens of the United States in making discoveries of valuable mines. It was a bounty to the persons named in that act—to citizens or those who had declared their intention to become citizens. The United States adopted a policy different from that which had been pursued by other countries, which usually reserved the mineral lands for the use of the Government itself. The United States gave it to the citizens upon these conditions. They did not intend that bounty for aliens, but after a location had been made by a person as described, a citizen of the United States or a person who had declared his intention to become such, then this subsequent act authorized him to dispose of it for a consideration to an alien, and did not debar aliens from buying and paying for it.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the Senator's opinion about the language of this act; that is all; and I concede, of course, that his opinion is entitled to deference. It is not the way I read the act. I think the word "acquiring" is a generic word, used in the generic sense. The alien land law was aimed at holding; and they said that this act shall not be construed to prevent any persons not citizens from acquiring and holding.

That any alien who shall hereafter hold lands in any of the Territories of the United States in contravention of the provisions of this act—

Even in violation of it—may nevertheless convey his title thereto at any time before the institution of escheat proceedings as hereinafter provided.

But, if the Senator is right, what follows? These locations are void. There is no proposition here in the interest of the men who made them to validate them, but there is a proposition here to invalidate them.

The proposition I made the other day, and I make it again, is that whatever the rights of these men are, they should be settled in the courts of the country under the law as it stood when those rights were acquired, and that Congress should enact, upon the demand of no one law and order league or whatever else the association may be called, a retroactive law changing their rights, if it be possible for Congress to do it.

Then I think, after putting upon the statute book such language as this, whatever we may choose to do as to the future, we ought, during its existence as a statute, to deal generously and fairly with the men who read it as authorizing them to locate and hold mining claims. It is almost nonsense to say that it was intended by this act that an alien could buy a mining claim of the Senator from Nevada, put hundreds of thousands of dollars in its development, own it, manage it, take the gold from it, and when his right was challenged, and it could only be challenged by the United States, he could do one of two things: He could save it to himself, as its owner, by declaring his intention to become a citizen, or, if he chose not to declare his intention, he could save it, so far as its value was concerned, by receiving the money it brought at a sale on judgment of escheat.

Now, why change the law as to past transactions? Congress never intended, I think, to make those safeguards, to authorize an alien to acquire mining claims, to hold mining claims, and when called on by proceedings of escheat to qualify himself to become an owner even to patent, by declaring his intention, or to take the value of it out of the registry of the court when sold, and yet not permit him to locate it.

It was the policy of Congress to invite aliens to invest in mines, or that section would not have been put upon our books. We ought to keep the pledge and we ought to keep it fairly and generously, whatever we may choose to do as to the future. If it is thought wise by Congress to provide that no alien hereafter shall acquire or hold a mining claim, well and good. That is one thing; this is another.

That is not all there is to it. Of course this is general in its application. It puts a cloud upon the title to mining claims by the thousand all over Alaska. It is not directed simply to these claims located by Laplanders, most of whom declared their intention to become citizens, and all of whom tried to, and who obtained certificates from the court commissioner, who thought he had the right to issue them, and who paid for the certificates, and supposed they had declared lawfully their intention to become citizens of the United States. But it applies to other portions of Alaska. I am told that there are thousands of claims in Alaska outside of the Cape Nome region worth from fifteen to twenty million dollars, which have been owned and worked some fifteen years or more, the owners of which could not possibly prove that the original locator had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States. As it stands now they can not be divested; they can not be deprived. With this amendment adopted, I think they could be; at least it would put a cloud upon the title and interfere greatly with the mineral development of that region.

Neither is this a controversy simply between Laplanders and aliens and American citizens. A great many of these alien locators have assigned for value their locations. There are citizens in my own State, and that is what called my attention to this subject, who purchased those claims, purchased them in good faith; some of them have improved them, and they will be deprived, under this legislation, of the ownership of those claims. And the legislation is retroactive. I think we ought to leave the law as it is, and leave these people to assert their rights as they are under existing laws, so far as past transactions are concerned. If the Senator from Montana and other Senators here think we ought to change the rule as to alien ownership, change the rule as to the right to challenge the validity of alien titles, let us do it, but let us do it making it prospective in its operation and not retroactive. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I wish briefly to call attention to one phase of the subject which has interested me in connection with immigration for permanent inhabitants of Alaska. We are only coming to know and to realize what a valuable addition to our territory the purchase of that region is, and we also know that it is so far to the north and so far out of touch with any civilization which we have that it is altogether improbable that there will be any permanent settlers there in the way of development from among our own citizens; that after this harvest of gold has been reaped it will be returned to the solitude of the northern winter, the same as it has always been.

But the experiment with the reindeer and the introduction into that Territory of these Laplanders and Finns has opened up a new phase to my mind which has some bearing on this question, and that is that with the present treatment of the Finns by Russia, the outrageous tyranny (I say outrageous because I feel that there has been no action of any government within my knowledge dealing with its own subjects that is more tyrannical and outrageous than the treatment of the Finns by the Russian Government), there are large numbers of those people who are emigrating, and there is a threat and a very great probability that possibly half or two-thirds of those people will expatriate themselves rather than submit to the abominable Government and the loss of their liberties and their old institutions, and even their being robbed of the right to teach their children their own language. If those people choose to cross the ocean and come to this country, it is more than likely that they will drift into a similar latitude where they will have, as we all know, the kind of climate to which they are accustomed.

Mr. HOAR. Has the Senator any information as to the number of that people?

Mr. TILLMAN. There are over a million of them, possibly 2,000,000. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] can give us the statistics.

Mr. NELSON. There are about a million and a half.

Mr. TILLMAN. I knew there were over a million. They inhabit a similar territory to this very region of which we are now speaking, and as some pioneers have been brought over here by our Government for a different purpose and they have gone in there, if we start out to treat those people as outlaws and outcasts; in other words, if we undertake to change our laws now in regard to mines for the benefit of the jumpers of mining claims and blackmailers the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] spoke of yesterday, we at once throw a damper on the willingness of that people to come into our country and add to our citizenship.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not wish to interrupt him, but in that connection I happen to know through some English friends that there is a very great effort being made by——

Mr. TILLMAN. England.

Mr. HOAR. By humane societies in England to get this emigration to Canada.

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly. It is as desirable a class of emigrants as have ever come to this country. They are a very high type of the Caucasian race. They are a kindly, industrious, religious people, worthy of our respect and admiration, and I think we ought to be very careful about any action here which would in any degree cause a damper or a sense of distrust to arise in the minds of those few already here, who might send back word as to the advantages of this new country, and thereby we might indirectly do a great injury to the development of Alaska.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator desire to go on this evening?

Mr. BATE. I do not.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have an executive session.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

WORCESTER, MASS., A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senate before going into executive session to place on its passage a bill which will take but a moment. It is Senate bill 3296.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill.

Mr. HOAR. It is a bill recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and recommended by the Committee on Commerce. It provides for a port of delivery in the city where I live.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can not transact legislative business after the Senate has gone into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask if we can under the rule of the Senate transact business while the doors are being closed?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, my attention was diverted one moment. I intended to bring the bill up. It is a matter about which there can be no possible question. It is to make the city of Worcester, where I myself reside, a city of over a hundred thousand inhabitants, a port of delivery. It is recommended by the collector of the port of Boston, in whose jurisdiction it will come, by the Secretary of the Treasury, and by the Committee on Commerce; and I should like, for some reasons of personal convenience, to get the measure through to-day if I can.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is the Senate in executive session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been announced that the doors shall be closed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Nothing can be done, in my judgment, when the order is made except to close the doors and until after it has been announced that the Senate is in executive session.

Mr. HOAR. That has not been announced.

Mr. TELLER. It can not be done before.

Mr. COCKRELL. By unanimous consent, after the Senate is in executive session, we can consider the bill as in legislative session, but we can not transact business, under the rules of the Senate, while the doors are being closed.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator is right.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know I am right. I am going to protest against taking up a bill while the doors are being closed.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the bill be taken up and passed in executive session as in legislative session.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that as in legislative session this bill may be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 3296) to provide for the establishment of a port of delivery at Worcester, Mass.; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "that," to strike out:

There shall be appointed at said port a surveyor of customs with a salary of not exceeding $1,800 per annum, to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the payment of which compensation an appropriation is hereby made out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

And to insert:

The privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement be, and they are hereby, extended to that port.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate, etc., That Worcester, in the State of Massachusetts, be, and hereby is, established as a port of delivery, in the customs collection district of Boston and Cambridge, and that the privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement be, and they are hereby, extended to that port.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 20, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

Robert M. Wallace, of South Carolina, to be collector of customs in and for the district of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 19, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF JOURNAL AND RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a correction of the Journal as well as of the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that both be corrected as indicated in the paper I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the request of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Journal and RECORD be corrected so as to show the action yesterday on Senate amendments to H. R. 10449 to have been as follows:
That the House agreed to Senate amendments 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, and 8.
And agreed, with amendments, to Senate amendments 3 and 4.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois will be made as indicated.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8466. An act to amend an act entitled "An act in relation to taxes and sales in the District of Columbia;" and

H. R. 5485. An act providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

At the time the committee rose last evening a point of order was pending on the paragraph of the bill in reference to the appropriation for the construction of buildings at the Annapolis Naval Academy.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, under the agreement of yesterday I think the first business in order this morning, on the resumption of the consideration of this bill, is the recurrence to page 16 of the bill, under the agreement heretofore made. The Chair will recollect that it was agreed, by unanimous consent, that page 16 would be recurred to this morning, with the privilege, if desired, of an hour's debate on each side on the general topic therein presented.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. FOSS. That was the understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. That order was made by unanimous consent; and if the gentleman from Illinois desires to press it now, the Chair thinks it would be first in order.

Mr. CANNON. I would prefer its consideration now, because it may take some little time to dispose of the other item under consideration last evening.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will then recur to the paragraph beginning at the top of page 16, "For ocean and lake surveys;" and if there is no objection, the Clerk had better read the paragraph again.

The Clerk proceeded to read the paragraph beginning at page 16.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, before entering upon that paragraph——

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order was reserved, the Chair will state, against the paragraph at the time it was reached in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Before proceeding with or entering upon the consideration, I would like to rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When the committee rose last night the Chair had under advisement a decision as to a point of order raised with regard to appropriations for the Naval School at Annapolis.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so stated and is ready to make the decision, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has suggested that it was agreed, by unanimous consent, that immediately upon the resumption of the consideration of the bill to-day the paragraph beginning at the top of page 16 should be considered, as he has stated, for an hour on each side. Under the agreement heretofore made that provision of the bill will now be before the committee for consideration, by the unanimous consent then arrived at.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will yield, out of my time, to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] twenty minutes.

Mr. FOSS. Before the gentleman proceeds, I wish to suggest that if I understand the situation, it is this:

The point of order was reserved upon the paragraph in question. Under that reservation are we to go on and have general debate for two hours, one hour on a side? Does the gentleman understand that to be the agreement?

Mr. CANNON. I understand that we are to go on and have an hour on a side, and then let the matter be disposed of subsequently under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FOSS. Of course; but I was under the impression that the gentleman wanted a discussion on the merits of the proposition.

Mr. CANNON. That is the merits.

Mr. FOSS. Of course; but if it should be decided that it is subject to the point of order, then the discussion for two hours, one hour on a side, would be simply a waste of time.

Mr. CANNON. I will state to my friend from Illinois that so far as I am concerned, I do not desire to press the point of order, and I apprehend the gentleman from Massachusetts will not. I am quite content, while it is subject no doubt to the point of order, to dispose of the matter on the merits. It evidently has to be done at some time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the point of order was reserved; and it was agreed that it should be reserved; but it can be renewed at this moment by any gentleman who desires to do so.

Mr. FOSS. That is undoubtedly true; but if the gentleman is willing to withdraw his point of order and have the discussion straight and fairly upon the merits of the proposition, then well and good, and so much the better.

Mr. CANNON. Well, general debate on this subject, when it is subject to amendment, is dispensing with the point of order, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is in order if he desires to take the floor in opposition to the proposition.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. On the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I desire to make a suggestion, if the gentleman will allow me a moment.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. This will not come out of my time.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I just want to make one suggestion in the line suggested. If you intend to press the point of order, let us have a ruling on it.

Mr. CANNON. I send the following amendment up, if the gentleman will allow me. I suppose we can set gentlemen at rest by offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, strike out all of lines 1 to 23 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Ocean survey for special general service and the publication thereof, $10,000."

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I understand that my time now begins.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Twenty minutes, or such portion as he may desire.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I withdraw the point of order which I reserved, and debate this question upon the merits.

Mr. DAYTON. Pardon me just one moment. I want to know whether that withdraws the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL]?

Mr. BROMWELL. I will take just a moment of the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that after discussing this question with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] we decided that this question should be discussed upon its merits; the point of order reserved by the gentleman from Massachusetts should be withdrawn, and I therefore ask permission to withdraw the point of order that I made.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, very rarely a provision in an appropriation bill contains a proposition of as much importance as the one under discussion. It is very easy to conceal great changes which are enveloped in the language of an appropriation bill. Without attempting to recite the language of the paragraph I will state its effect. We have now a Coast Survey, which has been in existence almost a century. The proposition contained in this bill is to establish another and a parallel coast survey which shall be not under civilian but under military control. It is proposed, upon a debate of one hour on either side, to change a great department of the Government service from civilian to military control and to reverse the deliberate policy of Congress which has prevailed for nearly sixty years.

In order to understand the precise question it becomes necessary for me, with the utmost brevity, to state the history of the Coast Survey. It was established as a civilian department in the year 1807, and remained such until 1818, when it was transferred by law to the Navy Department, and there remained, with very unsatisfactory results, until the year 1832. Then, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy himself, who pointed out that, while the work of the naval establishment had been useful, it had "been very expensive in proportion to its usefulness." It was again transferred to the control of the Treasury Department. In 1834, two years afterwards, it was turned over to the control of the Navy Department, and remained there but two years, when it was transferred back again to the control of the Treasury.

Believing that it was necessary to settle for all time this long-vexed question, Congress appointed a commission, consisting of three naval officers, three Army officers, and three civilians, and in 1843 they agreed unanimously upon a report that the subject of the survey of our coasts was a proper subject for civilian activity and should no longer be under the control of the Navy Department. Accordingly, from that day to this the work of the survey of our coasts has been under the control of the Treasuay Department and in the hands of civilians, with the aid of such officers of the Navy as from time to time have been detailed. Attempt after attempt has been made to change the system. Congress has been appealed to time after time and has invariably refused.

In 1884 a commission was appointed—a Congressional commission was appointed—headed, I believe, by the present senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and after considering the subject for two years they reported to Congress that it was unwise and inexpedient to transfer this department from the control, the civilian control, of the Treasury to the military control of the Navy Department; and so it has remained. Now, when we obtained control over the islands which are now under the jurisdiction of the United States, just as we have done in the past, the appropriations were made for the Coast Survey to survey their coasts. They have gone on and done it. They have completed the survey of Porto Rico. They have completed the survey of the Hawaiian Islands with the aid, and important aid, of the Navy Department.

They have not begun the surveys of the Philippine Islands. In this section of the bill it is proposed to establish, side by side with our civilian coast survey, a coast survey under military rule.

Now, for one, I want to begin to resist these attempts, because they are coming to us from all sides—to resist them at the very threshold and resist them to the very end. The danger of militarism does not come from an increase of the Army or an increase of the Navy, if they are confined to their proper uses, but it comes from an increase of the sphere of their activities. When you extend the dead hand of militarism over the sphere that is appropriate to civilian action, then you begin to incur the dangers of militarism, which have been dreaded from the beginning of the Republic.

Now, because my time is limited, I am going to state very briefly the reasons why I think it is unwise to make this change. Everybody agrees that we ought not to have two coast surveys. If we establish this military coast survey we ought to abolish the civilian coast survey. We do not want one coast survey for the coast of the continental United States and another coast survey for our insular possessions. It would be expensive; it would be unwise in every respect. We must have one or the other, and if we establish this military coast survey to-day we must abolish the civilian coast survey to-morrow upon the sundry civil bill, and we ought to do it. We all agree there ought not to be two, and the choice presented to this House is whether you will continue the civilian scientific coast survey or put it in the hands of a military arm of the Government.

We ought not to do this, in the first place, because we are doing it upon an appropriation bill. We are changing the policy of a century, although our own commission only a few years ago, after two years' deliberation, reported against it. We ought not to do any such indecent thing as that. I say again that the Navy has neither the ships nor the men to do this work. Why, I hold in my hand a letter, written yesterday to me by the Secretary of the Navy, in which he says that in order to man the ships we already have now under repair and construction and those in the Government service he wants 1,447 new officers. He wants almost to double the force of officers of the American Navy.

Is it not a strange thing, Mr. Chairman, that when he comes and tells us that the Navy to-day, for its own duties, is 1,447 officers short, we should extend the activities of the Navy over a proper civilian sphere?

The Navy has not the ships. You can not do it with the cruisers, you can not do it with the battle ships. You must have small boats, sometimes sailing vessels, vessels that are adapted only to the service of the coast survey, and the Navy has not got them. All over the world the survey of the coasts is done by vessels that are appropriated to that work and done by men who are experienced in that work. The Navy has neither the ships, nor the men, nor the officers with which efficiently and economically to perform this work.

I say they can not do it with economy. Bear with me while I give you two or three instances of the economy of the Navy Department when they strike civilian life. I yield to no man in admiration for the splendid men and officers of our Navy. Where they are they are unsurpassed—nay, more, they are unequaled—by the men or officers of any navy in the word. Let them stay there where they shine. Let them leave civil affairs to be administered by civilians.

Now, let us see something about the economy. The Blake has been surveying Porto Rico. The Eagle and the Yankton have been surveying the coast of Cuba under naval control. We can not exactly compare the expense, but taking the coal and personnel we find that the Eagle and Yankton cost per year $46,000 apiece, while the Blake, the civilian vessel, costs only $25,000, only a little more than half as much as one of those vessels, and they do three times the work in the same period of time, according to the testimony which comes to us.

Then, again, under the Navy they have to hire the seamen for four years. What the Coast Survey wants is a man for a month, a week, perhaps three months—a man that they can hire upon the spot and discharge when the work is done. For instance, in Porto Rico, hire men who are familiar with the coast, and when they get through with them discharge them, instead of employing seamen for four years; because under the Navy personnel bill he can not be enlisted for any shorter time.

When the Spanish war began, our naval officers who had been detailed to act in the Coast Survey all left it. They all went to their appropriate duties. Their places were taken by civilian officers, who are performing the work to-day better than the naval officers were in their time. The pay and allowances of the naval officers were $89,000, and their places were supplied from the civilian establishment by men who receive only annual salaries and allowances of $27,500.

Let us go again here to the Naval Observatory, right at our doors, and see how the Navy is administering that. Compare it with two great naval observatories, one in this country and one in Great Britain. At the observatory at Greenwich the scientific salaries are $33,000, and the clerical, skilled, and unskilled salaries are $6,000. At the Harvard Observatory the scientific salaries are $39,500, the clerical, skilled, and unskilled labor $2,500. When we go over here to our Naval Observatory we find that the scientific personnel costs $28,000, and the clerical, skilled, and unskilled labor costs $34,720.

What sort of an administration is that in the sense of economy?

In the meantime the administration and results of that establishment are the laughingstock of the scientific world. Why, gentlemen, we must not expect these naval officers to devote their hours of retirement from active duty to work in which they have no interest and work for which they have no special fitness, but only the fitness that is possessed by well-educated, cultivated men.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is but one other observation, and then I am going to stop, because I am not going to multiply words about this. The naval officers are not as efficient as trained civilians in this work. Many of the best hydrographers we have had in the history of the country have been naval officers. But that is the exception, not the rule. They are detailed for two years and two months on an average, as shown by the records since the civil war. Many know nothing about the work when they begin; they have aptitude for learning, but they have no interest; they are to go somewhere else next year, and by the time they become familiar with the work they are transferred and a new man is put in. They can not do the work as well as men trained specifically for it, and it is not to their discredit at all that they can not do it. Every man to his own trade.

I echo heartily the words of my friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] the other day when, speaking of the naval constructors endeavoring to build ships in the shipyards, he said, "I want the sailor on the deck of the vessel at sea." Our officers are taken as boys, trained especially for one end in view. They are educated not for civil life, but away from civil life, and it will be one of the greatest mistakes, one of the most threatening steps, if this Congress undertakes to abolish a great civilian department and substitute for it one that is under military control.

Mr. GAINES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he sits down.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Well, a very brief question.

Mr. GAINES. I was not here at the beginning of the gentleman's remarks, as I was in the committee room, and I did not hear his objections to the provisions of the bill. I would be glad if he would summarize them briefly.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. My time has so nearly expired that I will leave that to somebody else. It will be better done than I can do it, and I yield back my time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I do not quite understand the question as the gentleman from Massachusetts has put it.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, let us have order.

The CHAIRMAN. The House will be in order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me for a suggestion, I want to say to the members of the committee that many gentlemen are asking me to yield a part of my hour. I have promised to yield in some instances, and I want to call attention of the committee to the fact that when the two hours' debate is over, this whole proposition is under the five-minute rule as long as the majority of the committee want to discuss it.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand the question as the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated it. We are not seeking to abolish the Coast and Geodetic Survey. All we are seeking to do is to hold the Coast and Geodetic Survey to the original jurisdiction which was given it under the revised Statutes at Large. This Survey was established in 1807. There has never been any question between the Navy Department and the Treasury Department as to the ocean and lake service until when? Until March 3, 1899, when the Appropriations Committee brought in a provision in the sundry civil bill extending the original jurisdiction of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, which was originally confined to the coast of the United States and later to the coast of Alaska.

They brought in the sundry civil bill, which became a law, a provision providing for the extension of the jurisdiction of the Coast and Geodetic Survey until it should include the coast of Cuba, Porto Rico, and of the Philippine Islands—"all islands," quoting the language of that bill, "under the jurisdiction of the United States." The only question here is whether or not the American Navy shall have the right to make ocean and lake surveys which it has done for years. In fact, this provision substantially has been in the appropriation bill for a great many years; ever since the American Navy was established they have always made the ocean surveys. Ever since the days of Old Jack Barry and Essex Hopkins and John Paul Jones, the American Navy, charged with the responsibility of conducting these ships over the ocean, have claimed the right to make the ocean surveys and of the isles in the ocean.

Now, what is the question? The question is simply as it stands to-day by reason of this amendment that was brought in last year and became a law on the sundry civil bill, extending the jurisdiction of the Coast and Geodetic Survey so two Departments of Government have concurrent jurisdiction of the same subject.

The Secretary of the Navy, in a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, stated some facts in connection with this matter. He says, in substance, Why do you not permit the Coast and Geodetic Survey to resume its original jurisdiction? He says, Let the Navy have its original jurisdiction, and there will be no question between the two conflicting elements.

What we are contending for is the coast surveys of the islands of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands—not for the coast survey of our own country. This is the Navy's jurisdiction.

Why, Mr. Chairman, twenty-five years ago, under this general provision of law, we surveyed the Midway Islands in the Pacific Ocean. What do we claim? That it is more economical for the Navy to do it than for any other body. What has the Navy been doing during the last few years in this regard—I mean with reference to the surveys of the islands? Why, they have surveyed the principal harbor in the island of Guam. They did not send a vessel there for this purpose. They had one there, doing other duty—a naval vessel manned by American officers and seamen, patrolling the coast—and they were directed to make a survey of the principal harbor of that island while on this other duty.

Manifestly it was a saving to the Government to have it done in that manner. What did it cost? Simply $1,000 more for the purchase of a few surveying instruments, because let me tell you that every vessel in the American Navy carries a great many surveying instruments wherever they go, for use in special surveying works; but in this case it was necessary to spend a small additional sum for extra instruments. Would any gentleman claim that it would have cost less to have sent a vessel out there for that purpose? Every officer of the Navy is educated to a certain extent in this work, and every vessel that leaves our ports carries surveying instruments and is able to do ordinary surveying. Well, we surveyed that harbor and the only cost was the sum I have stated.

Again, down in Cuba during the last year we had two vessels officered and manned by American seamen—men who were paid out of the naval appropriation. It makes no difference whether they were employed on the surveying of the islands or otherwise, they would still be paid out of the naval appropriation bill.

Now, what have we done in Porto Rico? We have had a vessel there, the Vixen, which has done some work of surveying; and in the Philippines we are rigging out six vessels, a part of a fleet—small vessels, yachts and tugs—to be used for the same purpose at a nominal cost to the Government. They are all there now on the ground ready for the work, patrolling the coast, and they can be employed without additional cost to the Government for this service. Now, shall we build up another naval corps to do the same work when our own officers and our own men on the ground can conduct these operations without any large additional expense to the Government whatever?

Mr. MORRIS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. FOSS. Certainly.

Mr. MORRIS. Will the gentleman state by what body the surveys of the Great Lakes are made, whether by the Coast and Geodetic Survey or by the Navy Department?

Mr. SOUTHARD. There are three surveys made there.

Mr. S. A. DAVENPORT. Only two, I think.

Mr. FOSS. The work is done by the Navy Department and the War Department.

Mr. MORRIS. Is it not done by the Coast and Geodetic Survey?

Mr. FOSS. I will state to the gentleman——

Mr. CORLISS. If the gentleman will permit me, I would ask if it is not true that the surveys and charts of the lakes have been duplicated for years by the Army and Navy surveys?

Mr. FOSS. I do not so understand. I dare say that so far as these Departments are concerned I think they have worked in unison, and neither of the Departments has duplicated the work of the other.

Mr. CORLISS. I will state to the chairman of the committee that I have a communication from a member of the Deep Waterway Commission who informs me that the work is being duplicated, and consequently the survey by the Navy is unnecessary on the Great Lakes and involves an unnecessary expense.

Mr. FOSS. I want to suggest, in answer to the gentleman from Michigan, that there has not been a duplication of this work, so I am informed.

Mr. CORLISS. Let me state to the gentleman that not only the main survey, but the published charts, which are simply a duplication of the work, have been made by the Army.

Mr. HOPKINS. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that the work on the lakes is the work of the War Department entirely?

Mr. DAYTON. I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. BURTON], who will speak after a while, is prepared to give the facts showing that for eighty years the survey of all the waters of the Great Lakes, including the rivers and the harbors opening into them, has been under the control of the War Department and has been made by the Engineer Corps of the Army.

Mr. FOSS. The work which the Navy Department has been doing on the Great Lakes, as I understand, has been that they have used the Michigan, when it was not used by the Naval Militia, in finding out the shoals and obstructions to navigation. They have never, so far as I have been able to find out, duplicated the work of the War Department.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FOSS. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I call the gentleman's attention to the language of this bill on page 16:

Continuing the investigation and charting of reported obstructions to navigation in the United States waters of the Great Lakes.

Now, does not that provision contemplate the doing of work by the Hydrographic Bureau of the Navy Department which it has not done heretofore?

Mr. FOSS. I do not understand that it does. That language is purely explanatory of what the Navy has been doing, as I understand, from the chief of the Bureau.

Mr. BURTON. Then why is that language used which does not appear in any previous bill?

Mr. FOSS. It is simply explanatory of the work of the Navy.

Mr. BROMWELL. And why is provision made for hiring vessels if the Michigan is going to do the work? Why hire additional vessels if the Michigan is going to continue the work which you say it has done?

Mr. BURTON. Allow me a further question.

Mr. FOSS. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. This work is already done by another bureau of this Government, and has been for nearly sixty years past, at an expenditure of nearly $3,000,000. Now, is it a safe experiment to make an appropriation which looks to the duplication of this work by the Navy Department? Is it not true that charts have been made, some seventy in number, of the Great Lakes—very complete charts?

Mr. FOSS. Yes, there has been a number of charts made. Those are made simply for the mariner; they are pilots' charts, made purely for the mariner.

Mr. BURTON. What other use have you for such charts except for mariners?

Mr. FOSS. That is all.

Mr. BURTON. Why, then, should the Navy Department make other charts?

Mr. FOSS. I do not understand that it makes any charts except those necessary to guide the mariners over the lakes.

Mr. BURTON. Is it not true that there are already systems of charts for the guidance of the mariner—charts made by the War Department, on which, as I say, that Department has been at work since 1841—charts which have been made at very great cost?

Mr. FOSS. There are charts which have been made by the War Department, but you can not find very many mariners upon the sea, or upon the lakes either, who are willing to use them.

Mr. BURTON. My question did not refer to the sea.

Mr. FOSS. I say "upon the lakes."

Mr. BURTON. They have been used in building up one of the largest traffics in the world.

Mr. DAYTON. Those charts have been so used after they have been prepared and revised by the Naval Hydrographic Office—not before.

Mr. FOSS. I can not yield longer, as I wish to proceed with my argument.

I am more anxious in regard to the survey of the waters of Porto Rico and Manila and other places where our battle ships and our protected cruisers go. Our sailors are charged with the responsibility of taking these mighty engines of warfare and safely conducting them over the ocean. I take it gentlemen here are not willing to take away from the American naval officer the right to make those surveys on whatever seas may be to-day uncharted. I say that out of common decency, out of common honesty, out of common fairness, if you hold the naval officers responsible for the safe conduct of our ships in foreign ports, you will not refuse to them the right to make the surveys of the uncharted seas. [Applause.]

One thing more: The Coast and Geodetic Survey has never till during the last year made a chart that was pleasing to the naval officer or to the mariner, so far as I have been able to find out. They use the polyconic section. That is not used by any navy, by any merchant marine, that I know of or have ever heard of. Take the merchant marine, for instance, that sail the ships across the Atlantic. They all move on the Mercator section. The Mercator section is a straight line, and they move on a straight line. The polyconic section is a curved line, and one has to sail on a curved line; and nine months or so ago, after protests had been made repeatedly before the Coast and Geodetic Survey against this section, they adopted the Mercator section.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman permit a correction?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSS. Oh, certainly.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The gentleman stated that the merchant marine nowhere use the polyconic charts.

Mr. FOSS. I mean the merchant marine of foreign countries.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Let me state that a letter was sent to all those interested in the merchant marine in the United States, and the majority replied in favor of the polyconic, although that is not of importance, because the Coast Survey furnishes both. They can take their choice.

Mr. FOSS. Every foreign navy in the world makes its own coast surveys, with the exception of the little navy of Portugal, and our own. Here I have a Navy List which I bought in England this summer. What do we find here? We find under the hydrographic office that the coast survey is under the head of Rear-Admiral Sir William Wharton. We find that all his chief assistants are naval officers. Here are men who are navigating or surveying engineers. In France they have hydrographic engineers. In Germany they have a corps of professors. In Denmark and in Sweden and in every country in the world except Portugal surveying is under the administration of the navy department.

My friend says they have a special corps. Yes; they must have a special corps abroad. Why? Because they do not educate a naval officer as we educate him. The naval officer in England or in France or in Germany receives a differentiated education on certain particular lines. They have navigating engineers; they have gunnery engineers; they go into differentiation and specialization; but in our Navy we train our men in gunnery, in navigation, in surveying. Yes, by the operation of the personnel law of last year we train them in engineering. We give them a broad and general education.

The foreign sailor knows one thing. When unforeseen circumstances come upon him, when great emergencies arise, he stands there and knows not what to do. He is only trained for one thing. But when our American officer is called upon to meet emergencies, when he is called upon to meet unforeseen circumstances, he, by reason of the completeness of his education, does not stand there helpless. He becomes the master of obstacles and emergencies and makes them the stepping-stones to fame, to reputation, and to glory.

So, I say to you, that the same principle that applies to foreign navies does not apply to ours, because our officers are trained in surveying, and they can do this work while we are at peace with the world without any expense to the Government, comparatively speaking.

Now, I am not trying to take away from the Coast and Geodetic Survey any of their original jurisdiction. They can go on and survey the coasts of this country, if they want to. And let me say to you that up to the beginning of the war practically all of the coast surveying under the head of the Coast and Geodetic Survey was done by officers and men detailed from the American Navy. Now, we have the ships. We have eighty-five auxiliary cruisers—little boats, converted yachts, tugboats—just the things to make a survey with. We have the men. We have the officers. If the Coast and Geodetic Survey go into it, they have got to hire the men, they have got to buy ships, they have got to hire the officers, at great expense to the Government. Here in the Book of Estimates they are asking for an increase in appropriations this year of $350,000.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does that include the additional expense of the survey of the Philippine Archipelago on the part of the Coast and Geodetic Survey?

Mr. FOSS. I am not informed as to what the cost of that would be.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What, in your judgment, would be the increase in expense if the Coast and Geodetic Survey take up the survey of the Philippine Archipelago?

Mr. FOSS. Well, I do not know exactly. I believe they state somewhere about $2,000,000.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Who states that?

Mr. FOSS. My impression is that Mr. Pritchett states that somewhere; that if you will give him $2,000,000 he can make a survey of the Philippine Islands. In our Navy we have our ships over there; we have our men over there; we have our converted yachts and tugboats and everything of that sort; we have the sailors and officers over there, everything to go on with the work.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And it can be done by the Navy without additional expense.

Mr. FOSS. Done by the Navy for a trifling expense; and at the same time we are doing this we are asking for this because the American Navy has always done the ocean survey—always done the ocean surveys; and they always considered the islands in the oceans belonged to the ocean and properly a part of ocean surveys. Now, here is another point. We do not want to abolish the Coast and Geodetic Survey. We think they should confine themselves to their original jurisdiction—the coasts of the United States and the coast of Alaska, 20 leagues from the shore and 5 miles inland.

Let me tell you that they have got all the work they can do. They started in 1807 and they have just completed the first survey of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, and they have not started on Alaska yet. Now, the Alaska coast line is nearly twice as long as the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coast lines, and I say to you that with the present rate of rapidity of that Bureau a century after you and I are dead and gone they will still be working on Alaska.

Mr. DAYTON. They have been nearly a century on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. FOSS. Now, there have been investigations had upon this. The gentleman has pointed back to an investigation in 1848. There was an investigation also that he has referred to by a Congressional committee of which Mr. ALLISON was a member, but I do not remember that Mr. ALLISON stated that he was opposed to turning over the Coast and Geodetic Survey to the Navy Department. Here is the opinion of that commission:

The members of the commission, finding this survey under the control of the Treasury Department continuously for a period of fifty-four years (with the exception of two years, from 1834 to 1836), with men at the head of the survey confessedly of the highest scientific attainments during all this period, do not feel justified in proposing a change in the organization and method of the survey unless the most urgent reasons therefor can be given, especially in view of the fact that those best qualified to judge who have testified before the commission, not including some eminent officers of the Navy, uniformly agree that, at least until the survey of the coast shall be completed, the work should be continued under the present organization. The commission submitted this question, among others, to the National Academy of Sciences, a committee of which reported that, for the present at least, or until the original survey is completed, no change should be made.

And again:

Without considering the question of the resurvey of portions of the coast made necessary by changes which are constantly taking place in the shores and channels, partly from natural and partly from artificial causes, it is estimated by those in charge of the survey that with the present scale of appropriations five years will complete the Atlantic coast and nine years will complete the Pacific coast. A majority of the commission concur with the view expressed by the Academy of Sciences that when the original survey shall have been completed it will be time enough to raise the question whether or not the hydrographic work involved in these resurveys may not be transferred to the Navy Department; but until that time the undersigned believe that question should not be seriously considered.

That, I understand, was the recommendation of that committee, and then, Mr. Chairman, we have had other investigations. Now, I want to read you something that President Cleveland said in his message of the work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey:

The work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey was during the last fiscal year carried on within the boundaries and off the coasts of thirty-two States, two Territories, and the District of Columbia.

Then he goes on and says:

In July last certain irregularities were found to exist in the management of this Bureau which led to a prompt investigation of its methods. The abuses were brought to light by its examination, and the reckless disregard of duty and the interests of the Government developed on the part of some of those connected with the service made a change of superintendency and a few of its other officers necessary. Since the Bureau has been in new hands an introduction of economies and the application of business methods have produced an important saving to the Government and a promise of more useful results.

Right there let me tell you I am not in favor of allowing the Coast Survey to make this survey for the reason that it is a political department. Every four years there is a change in the head. There have been changes during the last twelve years three or four times, I am informed. This is too important a work to leave to a political bureau, so to speak. Now, what more does President Cleveland say? He says, speaking of the Coast and Geodetic Survey:

This service has never been regulated by anything but the most indefinite legal enactments and the most unsatisfactory rules. It was many years ago sanctioned, apparently for a purpose regarded as temporary, and related to a survey of our coast. Having gained a place in the appropriations made by Congress, it has gradually taken to itself powers and objects not contemplated in its creation and extended its operations until it sadly needs legislative attention.

So far as the further survey of our coast is concerned, there seems to be a propriety in transferring that work to the Navy Department. The other duties now in charge of this establishment, if they can not be profitably attached to some existing department or other bureau, should be prosecuted under inquiries which may properly be assumed by the Government and those which should be undertaken by State authority or by individual enterprise.

It is hoped that the report of the Congressional committee heretofore appointed to investigate this and other like matters will aid in the accomplishment of proper legislation on this subject.

Now, in the last Administration, Secretary Carlisle, Secretary of the Treasury, and Secretary Herbert, Secretary of the Navy, got together and recommended this: They recommended that the geodetic part of the coast survey be transferred to the United States Geological Survey, and they recommended that the coast survey part of it be transferred to the American Navy.

Mr. FLEMING. Will the gentleman allow me a question there?

Mr. FOSS. Not just yet. Wait until I get through, please.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not ask that the Coast and Geodetic Survey be divided up, although that has been the recommendation of the last Administration. I do not ask that one part of it be transferred to the Navy and one part to the Geological Survey. We have nothing to do in this bill with the Coast and Geodetic Survey. Secretary Long said, in his letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations:

Let the Coast and Geodetic Survey stand by its original jurisdiction, the coasts of this country and of Alaska, which will afford it work for a century to come, and let the American Navy do the ocean survey. Let it do this survey, which it has always done ever since the American Navy was established.

[Loud applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CANNON. To whom does the gentleman yield? Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left and how much time has the gentleman left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has forty-four minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the committee, has thirty-one.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE].

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Chairman, I can not discuss this matter as I would like in five minutes, but I want to call attention to some of the statements made by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from West Virginia, who advocate the extension of the jurisdiction of the Navy Department so as to duplicate the work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. One of the reasons urged by the gentleman from Illinois is that this work has heretofore been done by naval officers. This is not true except in part. Some of the naval officers who have been detailed to do survey work were at the beginning qualified to do it, but nearly all of them have had to have more or less training for survey work after they went upon duty. This is no reflection upon these officers, for this work requires special training and experience. But, sir, we can not longer use these officers even to assist in such work, because we need in the Navy as many more officers as we have now to officer the ships we now have in commission and those authorized.

Mr. FOSS. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MCRAE. Certainly.

Mr. FOSS. I want to state that these officers and men will have to be aboard the ships and be aboard naval vessels, and they can do surveying to a large extent. While these naval officers are aboard of their own vessels they can do this duty in time of peace as well as not.

Mr. MCRAE. The gentleman thinks so, but in my opinion they can not; the history of this service shows that they have not suitable naval vessels to do such work and for half of the time the naval officers are on shore duty. When they are at sea they are deep-sea sailors with many vessels that can enter but few of our harbors. We spend thousands of dollars to dredge out harbors before our large vessels can enter for docking or other purposes. They can not do surveying with anything like a reasonable expense, and the experience of the past shows it.

The Navy Department had control of these matters at one time, and I have here the statement of the Secretary of the Navy during that time, Mr. Southard, that the surveys made under the Navy Department "do not afford materials for an accurate chart of the harbors and the approaches to them, and assist but little toward a perfect knowedge of our coast, which can only be acquired by that scientific survey of the whole." He said that to a certain extent the surveys made by the Navy had "been useful, but they have also been very expensive." It was turned over to the Treasury Department at the request of the Navy Department, because the maps and charts that were made were unsafe and not satisfactory to the navigators of the country nor to the Navy Department itself.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MCRAE. I have only five minuies, but will yield.

Mr. DAYTON. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that the Coast and Geodetic Survey since its institution has had to depend upon naval officers to do this work——

Mr. MCRAE. No; I do not.

Mr. DAYTON (continuing). And that over 2,000 officers have been engaged in the work?

Mr. MCRAE. Yes; and nearly all of them had to be trained to it after they went there. But, even if trained for this work, you can not use them any longer, because you have not the officers to spare from the Navy. We have other and equally important work for them to do.

It is said that the civilians have been engaged in adding unnecessary details of topography. It is a question of judgment, to be determined by the circumstances in each case, but no hydrographer of reputation will deny the necessity for topographic information on coast charts. Rear-Admiral Belknap said in 1897 that "topographic features of coasts and harbors are as necessary to know as hydrographic conditions of the waters." The Coast

Survey do both at the same time. Gentlemen say that this is unnecessary work; that it is useless. I say it is useless to think or talk about making a complete and perfect survey without taking the necessary information as to topography, and which the Coast Survey does. The naval officers, as I understand, pay no attention to topography. The water and land surveys must be connected and the triangulations and topography be on a par with the soundings.

Gentlemen say that naval officers are the only people qualified to judge of the hydrography. This I deny. We have 225 commissioned ships of the Navy, and we have over 3,000 ocean-going ships engaged in carrying the commerce from and to our country. Now, the Treasury Department and this Coast Survey under it represent this expanding commerce, and the Navy Department represents the increasing Navy. The civil bureau can and does furnish the necessary information to the Navy as well as to the merchant marine for at least one-half of the cost that the Navy can. Why not let them continue to do it?

Gentlemen say the Coast Survey has been sixty years surveying the coast of the United States. Now, that is a most remarkable statement to be made by those who insist that the Navy itself have done this work for the Coast Survey. Those who make such inconsistent statements can take the two propositions and reconcile them if they can. Gentlemen forget that much of the work of the Coast Survey consists of resurveys, which our increased commerce and the changes in our harbors make necessary.

Then they say that naval officers aboard these United States naval vessels in our waters can do this survey work as an incident to their regular cruising and save expense to the Government. This statement would appear to be fair, but the idea has been rejected by all nations that make maritime surveying. None of them use the regular naval vessels for their work, and we know that deep-draft vessels like those in our Navy can not make the surveys of our coasts, and particularly of many of our harbors on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. We have in the Coast Survey a fleet of small ships specially adapted for survey work, and should keep them. We might as well understand at the beginning that in this controversy there is something more than that which is boasted of by the gentleman from Illinois—the piloting of our war vessels across the oceans. The Navy is one thing and American commerce is another of equal importance. Our merchant marine carrying the products of the farm and factory must not be overlooked or belittled. These vessels must know where to start from, where to go to, and what they can rely upon on their voyage for trade. We have heard no complaints from this class of navigators against the Coast Survey work.

The gentleman from Illinois makes the objection that the charts used by the Coast Survey are on the polyconic projection and are not as well adapted to mariners as those published by the Navy on the Mercator projection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McRAE. I would like about two minutes more.

Mr. CANNON. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. McRAE. They say that the chart advocated by the naval officers is superior to that generally used by the Coast Survey. I will say that both of these charts were invented by civilians and both are used by the Coast Survey. I am informed that the polyconic projection, when used in a chart, affords substantially the same information given on a Mercator chart, and much more. I am informed that the Mercator projection is used in the small scale charts which cover wide area. On all other charts the polyconic is used. It is not true that all naval officers are and have been opposed to the polyconic projection. Its ablest defenders have been naval officers.

I want to call attention to what two naval officers have said about it. Commander Pillsbury, in his work on Charts and Chart Making, at page 198 of volume 10, says:

> There are many objections named to the polyconic projection, and some of them I will mention. Recently a commanding officer in the Gulf of Mexico noticed, I suppose for the first time, a chart on the polyconic projection. He was bound to New Orleans, and, calling his navigator, he asked how it was that the chart makers could have made such a mistake as to curve the parallels. Another objected because he could not lay out a course on it with confidence, fearing every time that his landfall would be miles away from his port. Another said he could not plot a bearing to a distant peak because the projection was curved and his bearing would be straight, forgetting that his line of vision was a straight line and following in the plane of a great circle, and that on Mercator's projection all lines except the meridians and equator, represent small circles of the earth.
>
> Another objected to this unwelcome innovation because he could not plot a position with a parallel ruler from the margin of the chart; and another because he was accustomed to Mercator's projection. I suppose I have heard scores more of as reasonable objections, and probably you have heard similar ones. If we are always to adhere to what is old, out of respect to the wisdom of our fathers, we shall never improve; but, perhaps, in future generations, when pounds, shillings, and pence, and ounces and pounds, are things of the past, eleven and a quarter degrees to a point of the compass will have gone, too; and men who go to sea will not be afraid to use a chart simply because it is on the polyconic projection.

One of the best-known hydrographers of the Navy said:

> As a rule the advocate of the Mercator projection, or rather the would-be wreckers of the polyconic, do not understand the subject, and, grasping a few superficial facts, condemn the latter without reason.

As a matter of fact, the Coast Survey is making both kinds of charts, at the request of and for the use of the Navy Department. Some officers may use one and others the other chart.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to repeat that the expense of using the Navy Department for the purpose of making coast surveys so far exceeds that of making them through the present efficient civil Bureau now organized and in operation that it ought to be at once conclusive to every Democrat, and to every other man who wants an economical expenditure of public money. So far as I am concerned, I love the Navy for the great battles it has won, for the splendid gallantry and the superb courage of its personnel, and the glory it has shed upon the American flag, but it should be confined to the purpose for which it was created; for the purpose for which we have recently used it—to protect, not survey, our coasts, and to repel foreign foes. The officers of our Navy are educated to fight, not to make coast surveys. In every naval battle in which they have participated they have shown their capacity to fight. They would, if required, even distinguish themselves as surveyors, but it is not necessary for them to do such work. We have a civil department able and competent to do it. Let us confine the Navy to its original, patriotic purpose, and extend, if necessary, the jurisdiction of the Coast Survey, one of the best-equipped and best-managed bureaus of the Government. Let us at every step resist the encroachments of the military upon civil jurisdiction. This is a question of the soldier against the civilian. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL].

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, while I fully agree with all that has been said by gentlemen who have spoken against this provision of the bill, I wish to call the attention of the committee more particularly to the lines of the bill to which I referred yesterday, commencing with line 13 and ending with line 18, and which read as follows:

> And continuing the investigations and charting of reported obstructions to navigation in the United States waters of the Great Lakes, including the hire of vessels, and the compensation, not otherwise appropriated for, of persons employed in the field work, under the authority of the Secretary of the Navy.

Now, gentlemen are all aware of the fact that under the provisions of the treaty with Great Britain we can not maintain a navy upon the Great Lakes. We have one vessel there, the Michigan, one of the light-draft, small vessels of the Navy. But the Great Lakes are the highways of probably the greatest commerce in the world. The surveys of the harbors of those Great Lakes and of the rivers that connect them have been made by the Engineer Corps of the Army. The soundings have been made by the same corps and charted. Every improvement that has taken place has been under the Engineer Corps—the rivers have been deepened, the harbors have been improved, all by the engineers of the Army.

Now, why this work of surveying and charting the Great Lakes should be given to the Navy Department is a question that seems to me difficult to answer. The work has been done for sixty years by the War Department. That Department has the material; it has the men; it has the vessels. They are prepared to go ahead with the work. They have charted these Great Lakes, and the charts have been used through all these years for navigation purposes. As I am informed, all that the Navy has done in the past has been to adopt the surveys made by the Engineer Corps of the Army, republish them as hydrographic charts, and issue them under the authority of the Navy Department. It is proposed in this bill to extend their work—to investigate obstructions; to locate shoals; to sound the Great Lakes, and chart these soundings.

Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me, as has been stated by other gentlemen, that when we have a deficiency in the number of our naval officers—when the number is insufficient to man the ships we now have and are building—it is a piece of the greatest folly to take these men whom we enlist in our service for manning and fighting our vessels and put them upon this work which is already in charge of another branch of the service.

I shall vote to strike out all this new matter in the bill; but more particularly am I opposed to this clause which takes away from the great Corps of Army Engineers the work they are doing on the Great Lakes and which the Navy under no circumstances can find any real reason or excuse for taking.

Mr. FOSS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY].

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Chairman, I heartily concur in the provisions of this bill; and while there seems to be some differences in the Naval Committee this year, they agree absolutely on this question, though they disagree upon some other matters. In 1896, when Mr. Carlisle was Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Herbert Secretary of the Navy, they agreed upon the policy laid down in the section now under discussion. They agreed that those things pertaining to the ocean belonged naturally to the Navy. The Geodetic Survey, in taking charge of these matters foreign to its real function, reminds me somewhat of an old hen that hatched about a dozen duck eggs. She stood upon the shore yelling to the little ducks floating out upon the water, much to the distress of the supposed mother.

The Navy is prepared with ships; her place is upon the ocean. Two or three hundred of our vessels are now scattered all over the world. We are contemplating the laying of a submarine telegraph system from here to the Philippines by way of Hawaii. How natural it is that all of those subjects should be under the control of the Navy, that is constantly upon the water and knows the conditions there.

I would not wish this bill to interfere with the War Department, that has control of the harbors and the rivers, as it naturally should. That Department is furnishing some very valuable charts, though the work could be much better done by the Navy than even by the War Department. But the more appropriate function of that Department is to remove obstructions from our rivers and harbors, a work which is now being very well done by that Department.

But, Mr. Chairman, for all the purposes of the many islands which have fallen into our possession by reason of the late war with Spain—Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippines—with 10,000 or more miles, perhaps, of coast about them to be surveyed, to be investigated and charted, I repeat, and I assert without fear of contradiction, that it can do the work better than any other branch of the public service. It seems to me that this omnivorous Treasury Department wants to absorb and control everything. Here are a number of subjects that manifestly belong elsewhere in the public service, but, in pursuance of the policy of the first gentleman who had control of the Treasury Department, Alexander Hamilton, who proposed to make that the Department of the Government and superior to all others, we find this demand made upon us now to leave everything to that Department, even those matters with which it has no possible connection.

Why, Mr. Chairman, look, for instance, at the catalogue of a few of them. Here we have the Life-Saving Service. Is that a matter that should be within the control of the Treasury? What has the Treasury Department to do with it? Why not submit it to the control of the Navy Department, where men have their lives in jeopardy every day that they are on the ocean; where they recognize the necessity of a proper support of this service?

Take the Light-House Service. Why should the Treasury Department control that? It manifestly and properly belongs to the Navy. Who are the most directly interested in the Light-House Service?

Here is another item—the inspectors of steam vessels. Whose work should that properly be? Should that be the work of the men who are engaged in this service, or the men in the Treasury Department, who know nothing about it? Should the men who go around and gather the taxes and pay the expenses of the Government have the control of it, and are they in a better position to understand the inspection of steam vessels than the men whose life is spent on the steam vessels? Put it under the control of men, as it should be, whom you have scientifically educated for that purpose. Would it not be manifestly better that the Government should turn over the whole service to them than to leave it under the control of the Treasury Department?

Here, again, we find the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Marine-Hospital Service and subjects of that kind should exclusively belong to the Navy and ought to be put under their control. Why not place them in the hands of the men who are the most conversant with their requirements, who have the most use for them, and know best what ought to be done with them to make them perfect?

A few years ago, when we had no Navy, practically, we had hundreds of men who were put out of the Navy because the Navy had a "great hump in it," and we had to make provision for a modification of existing conditions. Now we have a Navy—gathered mainly in the Philippines and Porto Rico and around Cuba—and I ask why it is not proper to put that Navy in control of these different items of expenditure? There is no excuse for the conditions that prevailed a few years ago. Take the different conditions now prevailing.

Mr. Chairman, if the Navy were to be rebuilt, if new conditions confronted us, and this controversy about the matter now in contention should be presented to the House, it would be found that the unanimous sentiment of the members of this body and of the people throughout the country would be to place these affairs under the control and disposition of the Navy Department, where they properly belong. It seems to me that these matters to which I have referred should properly and of right belong to the Navy Department. And I should not only give my warm support to their transfer to that Department, but would advocate it as far as I am capable of advocating it on the floor of this House. For that reason I am in favor of the provision of the bill under consideration.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question—as to whether the gentleman is in favor of the lake-surveying works being placed under the Navy Department?

Mr. FOSS. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire additional time?

Mr. BERRY. I would like to have one or two minutes to answer the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FOSS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky

Mr. BERRY. As to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio with regard to the lake surveys, I will state that I have traveled over the Great Lakes myself and have had occasion to look into the matter to some extent. Last summer I took occasion to go from Conneaut, near Cleveland, to Duluth over the Great Lakes, passing through Lake Superior, a great interior ocean, whose shores and general condition are well understood by the Navy Department by the long experience of the officers there with reference to it.

We have a little steamer, the Michigan, going from one end to the other with a body of seamen and marines all the time, who are expert and qualified for the work of the Department, educated at the Naval School at Annapolis, and these men so educated are entirely competent to take charge of the reports and the surveys on this vast inland sea of ours.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. BERRY. Well, I have but a moment, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON. How long, in the judgment of the gentleman, would it require the men on the little steamer Michigan to make the surveys necessary for full information and safe navigation on the Great Lakes?

Mr. BERRY. I believe the United States Government, under the law, is limited to one armed vessel upon the lakes; but I have no doubt that the Canadian government would not object at all if we sent additional vessels there, without arms and under the control of the Navy Department, with suitable men to survey these whole lakes, so that maps could be made upon which the Navy could rely as to where the ships would be safe and where they could go without danger.

Mr. BURTON. Will my friend permit another question?

Mr. BERRY. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. Did the gentleman in his trip on the lakes see any indication that that survey had not already been made?

Mr. BERRY. I think the survey is pretty well made, only I do not think that people who are not engaged in seafaring matters know as much about it as an arm of the service which is engaged in travel on the water.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-four minutes.

Mr. FOSS. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] five minutes.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, referring to the lakes, the remarks of the two gentlemen from Ohio answer themselves. The reason that the Army made the survey on the lakes is because under the treaty with our good, kind old mother England, we are allowed to keep only one naval vessel on our Great American Lakes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Only one armed vessel.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And as regards the Army and the Navy on the lakes, let me tell the gentlemen from Ohio that they are the last men in the world who ought to cast any stigma on the Navy in connection with that matter. Hull surrendered an American army to the British at Detroit; Commodore Perry protected your coast in Ohio by sinking the British fleet. That shows that the Navy, if it can not make a survey of the lakes, is of some service on the lakes when the vital interests of the country are at stake.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the impression is sought to be created here that this section is an aggression upon the Coast and Geodetic Survey. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman; it is an aggression of the Coast and Geodetic Survey over the Hydrographic Bureau of the Navy. The bill simply carries out a policy that has already been established.

In the Fifty-third Congress I had the honor of serving as the chairman of a committee of investigation concerning the Coast and Geodetic Survey. Both the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy had agreed that the Coast and Geodetic Survey should be swallowed by the Hydrographic Office in the Navy. I have not time to refer any further to the details of the investigation, but it was agreed that the situation as it was then should be maintained, despite the agreement of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Ever since then the Coast and Geodetic Survey, like its sponsor, the Committee on Appropriations to-day, has been seeking for more power, grasping it here, grasping it there—in the air, on the land, on the sea. It got into Alaska; it went to Porto Rico; it has gone to the Philippines and wants to grasp the work there.

Now, how are they situated with regard to the Philippine Islands? Why, they have only one vessel fit to go to the Philippines to make surveys, whereas the Navy has already there to-day from fifteen to twenty gunboats captured from and bought from Spain, already equipped, only wanting a few surveying instruments to go on with the surveys in those islands.

And you here attempt to take these surveys that have always been made by the Hydrographic Office and turn them over to a political bureau, the superintendent of which is liable to be removed with every change of Administration. It is a political bureau. The officers of the bureau have no license.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSS. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. CUMMINGS. It is a navy within a navy. The present superintendent has adopted a flag, used while he is afloat, which resembles very much the flag used by Admiral Dewey. [Laughter.] The officers are arrayed in a uniform more gorgeous than any uniform worn at the battle of Manila. I had a letter from an old boatswain in the Navy, now employed in the Coast and Geodetic Survey. I have mislaid it. He is employed in the Coast and Geodetic Survey, but he has served twenty years in the United States Navy. He wrote me saying: "CUMMINGS, it is pie. Nobody here knows anything about naval matters but me, and I have been appointed commander of the vessel, although I was nothing but a boatswain in the Navy." [Laughter.]

Now, the hydrographic work in every country is done by the navy. The reputation of our hydrographic work is the finest in the world. At every branch hydrographic office mariners rendezvous, and engineering and marine subjects are discussed. The captains of vessels can buy charts made by the Hydrographic Office, and they want no others. Do you propose to abolish these offices?

Every surveying ship of the Navy is an armed ship. It serves two purposes. A ship is often detached from survey duty to quell riots and other disturbances in foreign countries. The magazines of these ships are always full and ready for any emergency. The Viren was stationed at Bluefield last winter, and did preserve order as well as doing surveying.

The Yosemite has made a new survey of the island of Guam, and she is now on her way to the Philippines.

The number of retired officers of the Navy employed by the Hydrographic Office is 4—2 in Washington, 1 in New York, and 1 at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich. They are employed in accordance with section 1763, Revised Statutes. They are termed nautical experts and have passed the examination before the Civil Service Commission and were appointed upon its recommendation.

On September 14, 1899, announcements were made by the Civil Service Commission, through all the leading papers of the United States, including trade and nautical or marine journals, and a copy of the notice was also given to every newspaper correspondent in Washington, that an examination would be held by the Commission on October 17, 1899, for nautical experts. Only 4 candidates presented themselves. The examination was then postponed to November 14, 1899, and the widest publicity was given to the notice. Seven applications were received from this second notice, making 11 in all.

Of these 11, 4 were retired officers, 2 graduates of the Naval Academy not in the service, 1 an ex-volunteer ensign who served during the Spanish war. Of the 11 candidates, 7 passed the examination—4 retired officers, 2 graduates not in the service, and 1 ex-ensign. This statement proves how well adapted for surveying are officers of the Navy.

Relative to the survey of the island of Porto Rico, it seems that the Coast Survey took upon itself to issue a chart of that island in October, 1898, months before the signing of the treaty of peace with Spain. This chart, I am assured, was an exact reproduction of the Hydrographic Office chart. It is an indication of the manner in which the Coast and Geodetic Survey is extending its jurisdiction.

It seems that the commanding officers are landsmen not qualified or licensed to have charge of vessels at sea.

Previous to the Spanish war the accuracy of all charts issued by the Coast Survey for maritime purposes was vouched for by the hydrographic inspector of the Survey, an officer of the Navy. These charts also bore the names of the surveyor. Recently the charts issued by the Survey bear the name only of the Superintendent, who is neither a surveyor nor a seaman.

The value of a chart depends upon the reliability of the survey from which it is made. The charts from the Coast Survey are made by employees who hold their positions purely by the favor of the Bureau, and the average length of service of the Chief of the Bureau is about four years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that matters should be allowed to remain as they are to-day in regard to the Hydrographic Bureau and the Coast Survey and that this aggression on the powers of the Hydrographic Bureau cease.

Mr. FOSS. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fourteen minutes remaining.

Mr. FOSS. I suggest that my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, use some of his time.

Mr. CANNON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York is mistaken when he talks about aggressions that have been made by the Coast Survey upon the rights of other branches of the Government. The aggression in this particular matter, I want to tell the gentleman, comes from the Navy Department. The first time that this appropriation appeared or any appropriation of a similar character since 1843 was in 1884, where there was an appropriation for special ocean surveys of $10,000. That appropriation was omitted next year. Thus it continued——

Mr. CUMMINGS. The gentleman will allow me right there. Was it aggression on the part of the Navy Department when Secretary Carlisle asked to turn the Bureau over to the Navy Department?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not discussing that branch of the matter. This appropriation was omitted in 1885. It was resumed and continued at $10,000 until 1891. Then it jumped to $14,000 and continued until 1899, and then for the first time was this large appropriation, including these other duties, and if there was any aggression being used, it can not be evidenced by the fact that the duties of the Coast Survey were extended to Florida, to the California coast, to Oregon, and to Alaska. Its expansion came to them—expansion of the duties because of the expansion of the coast, not because of special legislation. But the gentleman says that the reason why the lake surveys were included was because after the treaty of 1814 the Government was prohibited from having naval vessels on the Great Lakes. He is mistaken about that. It was "armed vessels;" and armed vessels, I take it, are not necessary for the coast survey upon the Great Lakes.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I say "armed vessels."

Mr. HEPBURN. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois, in the admirable speech that he has just made, has shown that this is an extravagant waste of the public money; that there is no necessity for it. He has said, and the gentleman from New York has reiterated, that the Navy is provided with accomplished scientists to do this work; that it has all the men; that it is amply supplied with ships—just the kind of ships that are needed for this work.

And here, at the very time, it seems to me, that they would enter into the performance of this duty, do you understand why they used over $122,000 last year; and why are you asking for $100,000 now? If you have the men, if you have the ships, if you have the scientists, if you have all of these elements that are necessary for the labor, why do you want $100,000 now? Why do you ask that you may expend it in the hire of ships and the employment of scientists? It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman has made the argument of all arguments disproving the rightfulness of placing this appropriation upon this bill. There is no reason for it, if the gentleman is accurate in his statement.

Mr. FOSS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. Has the gentleman read this provision which provides for the publication and sale of the results of ocean and lake surveys?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; and that was covered in the appropriation, and never exceeded $14,000 for fifteen years of time.

Mr. FOSS. Yes; and the more the surveys the greater the publications.

Mr. HEPBURN. But the gentleman does not mean to say, nor will he say, that $100,000 this year and $122,000 last year were necessary for the publication of the results of the labor of these gentlemen?

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman say that, with a regular authorized bureau having control of the whole expense and in charge of it in doing this work——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, this question now pending seems to be a controversy as to jurisdiction. The first proposition is whether the Committee on Appropriations shall have jurisdiction of this subject-matter or whether the Committee on Naval Affairs shall have it. The second proposition is whether the Coast and Geodetic Survey shall have jurisdiction over this subject-matter or the Navy Department.

Inasmuch as I am not a member of either of these great committees, I can look upon the first question of jurisdiction with some degree of disinterestedness. No gentleman on this floor will make any complaint as to any member of either of these great committees in their laudable desire to increase the importance and dignity of their several committees. It is proper; it is defensible.

When it comes to these other two departments—the Naval Department and the Coast and Geodetic Survey—I have no attack or criticism to make upon any of the gentlemen responsible for or connected with the Coast and Geodetic Survey. I presume that they are now discharging a useful and important service to the Government, and I deprecate, Mr. Chairman, the necessity upon the part of the gentlemen representing the Appropriations Committee or the Coast and Geodetic Survey of standing and making an attack upon the personnel of the Navy.

If there is any Department connected with the United States Government that during the last two years has demonstrated the integrity, the capacity, and the ability of its personnel, it is the Navy. It came through two years of war without a breath of scandal or any stain upon the name of any man who served in it; and it ill becomes the gentleman representing this other branch of the Government to assail its character, its efficiency, its integrity, here and now upon this floor, just for the purpose of transferring the jurisdiction upon this subject.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman be good enough to say who has assailed the Navy?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that in connection with the Naval Observatory the Navy had so conducted itself as to make that institution a laughingstock in the eyes of the world.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The scientific world, and I repeat that statement.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I submit that the personnel of the Navy needs no defense from me upon this floor. It is recognized in all Christendom, and stands to-day, as the result of its education and experience, without a peer. It has no parallel anywhere. Magnificent as are our ships of war, more magnificent and glorious are the men that command and man them. [Applause.]

I say I deprecate, in the attempt to transfer the jurisdiction, this attack upon the Navy. I know nothing about the details connected with the suggestions of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and for that reason I can not attempt to reply to them. Now, just a word as to this proposition.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Maine having given me credit for one quotation, ought to give me credit for the other——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; in the same speech the gentleman eulogized and criticised the Navy.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. And has not a representative of the people a right to do that on this floor?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly he has.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. If he has not, it is time that we should know it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not find any fault with the gentleman, but I say it is not necessarily involved in this proposition here, and I do not think the Navy will especially appreciate the championship which in the same speech eulogizes and criticises and ridicules it. The gentleman has a right to do it if he wants to, and I have the right also to refer to it on this floor.

Gentlemen have discussed the question of the lakes, but the great question involved here is, what bureau of this Government shall survey the Philippine Archipelago, with its thousands of islands, its thousands of miles of coast, around which our Navy, with magnificent ships, must patrol for years to come? I understand it not to be denied here that the Navy, with its existing ships and its existing personnel, can make these surveys with practically no additional expense.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Oh, yes; that is denied.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This hundred thousand dollars that is appropriated here is for details of expenditure and all the expenses involved in carrying on this Bureau.

Mr. CANNON. I will state to my friend that I do deny it. One hundred thousand dollars may be the expense just here, but a million will be the amount elsewhere in the appropriations, not mentioned here.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Let the gentleman point it out; let him show the place.

Mr. CANNON. There must be money for coal, and the pay of the Navy, the pay of seamen, the cost of ship's equipment, and many other things—"the whole shooting match." [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Very well; it is because we want the "shooting match" efficient that we want to leave this matter in the hands of the Navy. I read a statement from a rear-admiral of the Navy, who says:

> We have the ships, officers, and men. Survey work may be combined with ordinary police duties of small ships.

We have the vessels all over there in that archipelago. How many of them? There are 17 captured from Spain, with additional ships that we sent there. They are now patrolling and policing that coast; and with this expenditure of $100,000 they could go on with this hydrographic survey.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I know the gentleman wants the truth about this or any other question.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly; always.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Therefore he will allow me to call his attention to what the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation in the Navy Department said officially in 1890:

> "In these localities and in many others the state of our commerce demands trustworthy charts, but the information on hand is not fit to make them (referring to the Spanish main, south coast of Cuba, and the mouth of the Orinoco River, etc.). In all these cases after vessels had been detailed the plans have to be laid aside, as it was found that the exigencies of the service required these vessels for other missions, and among them the Thetis and the Ranger, looked upon as surveying vessels.
> "From the experience of the past year and of previous years it is clear that naval vessels regularly commissioned for service can not be spared from the larger demands of the general service long enough to render effective assistance in carrying out this work."
> That is, survey work.
>
> "Therefore I recommend, as my predecessors have done, that special vessels of the Navy be equipped for this service and permanently assigned to it."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is in relation to the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. It has relation to the survey of any coast.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That refers to the question of the transfer of the work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. It is dated in 1890, as the gentleman has stated. I have read the statement of a rear-admiral, written April 14, 1900, a good deal nearer to the present time than the gentleman's citation.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. What I read does not refer to the Coast and Geodetic Survey; it is in reference to the question of surveys by the Navy Department.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will read a little further on what the Navy Department says on this subject.

To recur to what I was saying, that substantially is the proposition. I am so informed by a rear-admiral of the Navy. I assume—because I have found these gentlemen to be truthful—that he states the fact. I have no doubt you can get contrary statements from representatives of these different bureaus.

Let me state the whole proposition. Briefly, it is this: That the Navy, while it is patrolling and policing that archipelago, can carry on this hydrographic survey. It is conceded that the Coast and Geodetic Survey, if it takes upon its hands the survey of the archipelago, must increase its personnel, must increase its vessels. Of course they have some vessels now; but are there a lot lying around now which are not in use? If there are none such, if all their vessels are now in use, then they have none to spare. Their vessels used for this purpose are not over there now in that archipelago.

The chairman of this committee says that this proposition will involve on the part of the Government an expense of about $2,000,000. I have heard the expense variously estimated—from $500,000 to a million dollars and $2,000,000.

What the proposition means is to transfer this subject from the Naval Committee to the Appropriation Committee, from the Navy Department to the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the respective expenditure involved is $100,000, perhaps, for the Navy, and in the end $500,000 or $2,000,000 for the Coast Survey. That is the economical proposition.

I call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to his suggestion in regard to the extravagant waste of the public money. I am ready to go on record on the proposition that $100,000 for the Navy Department is not so extravagant an expenditure of public money as a probable expenditure of $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 for the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Now, just a word as to the work of these two bureaus. What does the Coast and Geodetic Survey do?

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. FOSS. I yield the gentleman the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have no time to make any quotation, but the Coast and Geodetic Survey until within six months has done what with its charts? I make no criticism of this Bureau, because it is doing its work according to its ideas of its special province and purpose. It has made these charts upon the polyconic section plan. The Navy Department has done what? It has made its charts upon the plan of Mercator's Projection.

What does that mean? Mercator's Projection is the law of the sea. If there are any men on this floor who are familiar with navigation, familiar with the men who sail the ocean, they know that Bowditch's Navigator is to the seaman, the master mariner, what the Bible is to the Christian religion or the Revised Statutes to the lawyer. It is the law of the sea. That great book, which has been used by maritime nations for a century, is the law of the sea to-day, so far as navigation is concerned. Upon what plan? Mercator's Projection.

That is the plan on which the Navy Department does its surveying. All who sail the water, who have occasion to approach our coasts, who realize the dangers which they must meet, who appreciate the difficulties they must encounter, are obliged to rely upon these charts for their safety.

Mr. Chairman, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, within their province, in the performance of the duties assigned to them, have never made a chart on Mercator's Projection until within a very few years past, although in a communication from Commodore C. H. Davis, a member of the National Academy of Sciences and Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, we find the following language, to which I ask your attention:

> You can not be surprised that I should insist, as a practical navigator, upon the use of the Mercator Projection. The Mercator Projection belongs to the sea just as the modern compass does, and I may say that it finds its proper and peculiar value only on the ocean. So also the compass and Mercator's Projection belong to each other.
> Let me say it is only on the sea that people direct their way by the compass both for the moment and prospect. It is only on the sea that they have occasion to project a compass course as a guide, and it is only on Mercator's chart that such a course or rhumb line can be projected and inspected without calculation. All this is familiar to you, as it is to me in principle.

It is no reflection, therefore, on the Coast and Geodetic Survey to call attention to the fact to which I have directed your attention, but it is a recommendation of the Navy, and it seems to me that when they do the work themselves, so that it will be of use not only to the Navy, but for all maritime people on every occasion when they have to traverse our own coasts and this archipelago, consideration should be given to the recommendation of this committee. The same method is employed by the greatest maritime nation in the world, Great Britain.

Now a word as to what the Navy has been doing in this regard. The Hydrographic Office has prepared and issued annually about 1,000 charts for the use of navigators. The Coast and Geodetic Survey have issued how many? About 300; and, Mr. Chairman, these 1,000 charts are issued in accordance with the customs and practices in use amongst navigators, in use amongst the men who sail the ocean. This illustration briefly indicates the work of the two departments and the amount possibly which was expended in the work performed by them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would ask how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-seven minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I will crave the attention of the committee, Mr. Chairman, for that twenty-seven minutes, and will state as briefly as I can what I understand is to be done by the proposed naval bill that we are now considering and what will be done on the amendment I have offered if it shall be adopted.

First, let us clear away the underbrush and get rid of the various loose statements which have been made—the declamation, the firecrackers—get rid of the pyrotechnics which have been presented in this debate, and get right down to the clean, clear, and absolute facts. That is a business proposition. It does not abound in declamation or glory or anything else but common sense.

Now, my colleague from Massachusetts on the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MOODY] has briefly and clearly stated what the history of the surveys of the coasts of the United States has been. I wish I could take it up and deal with it more in detail and more fully. But he stated it correctly as far as the time at his disposal permitted him to state it. Let me say, however, that this effort on the part of the Naval Committee and certain officers in the Navy—not all the Navy, not a majority of the Navy—but of certain officers in the Navy—notably the one the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] referred to as a rear-admiral, has been trying to do, while in charge, just as his predecessors have been trying to do for almost a century.

This is not a new contention. For almost a century this survey of the coasts of the United States has been with the Coast Survey substantially, under civil domination and administration. Along in the late 20's it was transferred for a few years to the Navy Department, and the Navy Department, as I have the documents here to show, after six years of survey by that Department, reported the fact that their surveys, as a connected survey, were necessarily imperfect and substantially worthless. Now, without speaking disrespectfully of that, there was a reason for it to which I will refer a little later on.

The work was then retransferred to the Coast Survey, under the Treasury, where it has remained from that time to this. It was supposed it was finally settled in a contest in the early 40's, but up came certain officers in the Navy Department who wanted to absorb civil duties, and made the contest again in 1850. I have not time to read it, but it is a very interesting discussion. Mr. Jefferson Davis, then a Senator of the United States, led in the contest against transferring this service to the Navy in an exceedingly able speech, in which he told the truth about the Navy—that it was created to fight, educated to fight, to command the ships of battle in war, and that it was not educated for civil duties.

And finally, when four-fifths of that Congress for the second time turned down the effort to establish a coast survey in the Navy Department, Mr. Davis expressed the hope that that would finally settle the contention; but it did not. It came again and again. It came in 1884. A joint commission of the two Houses for two years investigated, and under their report the surveys of the coast remained as the law then and now provides, with the Coast Survey.

So much for that. The Navy is not equipped to do this work——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman yield for a minute?

Mr. CANNON. I have but little time, but I will yield.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not know but I may have possibly misapprehended. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the education which naval officers get at the Academy would not qualify them for this work?

Mr. CANNON. That is substantially true, unless they receive further qualifications.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What do you mean by that?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will explain in a moment. In the first place, the Navy of the United States, like the Army, represents the arm of force of the Government. They are a little knot of people set off to one side. They do not deal in decrees and judgments of courts. They are called into the service of the country for the purpose of accomplishing the objects of their country as an arm of force when everything else has failed, and they are educated from that standpoint.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Just one moment, please. Is it not a fact, if the gentleman will excuse me, that they have a thorough education in engineering?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And in navigation?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does not that involve this precise proposition of surveying?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; but this precise matter of surveying involves something more than that, as I will explain, if the gentleman will listen to me. When he asked the question a moment ago touching the equipment of these people, he wished to know if they were not liberally educated? Yes; at the expense of the Government. For their benefit? Oh, no. This magnificent twelve-million-dollar establishment that we are now constructing to educate these naval cadets at Annapolis is not for their benefit, God bless you. It is for our benefit. We pay them. They are devoted to that service; and, as I said before, it is a service that represents the arm of force.

Now, I must jump from one thing to another. I can not speak of this matter consecutively. The argument was made that the Navy has the ships; that it has the men; that it has the seamen; and therefore, as the ships of the Navy and the men of the Navy are scattered all over the world, that the Navy can do the coast-survey work cheaper and better than anybody else. Well, now, just mark how plain a tale shall put that down. One example is better than an hour of talk. Take the report of Admiral Bradford of the Bureau of Equipment. In the current year there was slipped into the naval bill, without notice in the rush, an appropriation to the Navy to survey Porto Rico, Cuba, Guam, and the Philippines. There was no law for it, but it abounded in appropriation only.

In pursuing that survey they sent the Bennington to the island of Guam. What did the Bennington do? It is a long way to Guam. The Bennington steamed over there to that island, and spent about two weeks in taking a general observation and putting up signals. What happened then? Presto, change! The necessities of the naval service caused an order to be served upon the Bennington to move on; and it went on to the Philippines, and that coast survey work stopped. The trip to Guam was lost. Two or three weeks' work in putting up signals was lost. What next happened? Why, another naval vessel was order to Guam. Has it ever got there? The Lord knows; I do not.

Mr. FOSS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. FOSS. Is not Guam on the route to the Philippines?

Mr. CANNON. Well, whether the Bennington was sent from the Philippines to Guam, or to Guam from somewhere else, I do not know. Does the gentleman? But it does not make any difference, nor is it material. The practical way to survey the coast of Guam is to survey it by a man who is competent to do it, with a crew of native sailors, if they can be hired, on a 200-ton sloop, a sailing vessel, or the smallest kind of a steam vessel, to go in there and put up the signals and survey it and to do the land work at the same time.

That is inexpensive, and brings rapid results. It would have been finished in a short time, comparatively speaking. Now, I give that as an example. Now, the claim is made that here is all this vast Navy that we have got that can be utilized in this service. I have just shown you one reason why they can not do it. Now let me show you another: 20, 25, 27, or 28 feet of water the ships of the Navy draw; they are wonderfully expensive engines of war, the vessels of our Navy in these latter days, officered by men that are trained to the service, manned by seamen that are enlisted for four years. Now, I would like to see you run the battle ship Indiana or the battle ship Oregon into 6, 8, 10, or 12 feet of water to survey these coasts!

Mr. FOSS. Have you ever heard of a battle ship being used for that purpose?

Mr. CANNON. The argument is that the ships of the Navy can be used wherever they are all over the world.

Mr. FOSS. Small vessels, converted yachts, and little cruisers.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do you understand that the survey is made from the deck of a battle ship?

Mr. CANNON. No, sir; I do not. Somebody has said that a child can ask more questions in a minute than a wise man can answer in a lifetime.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. A man can be childish in not undertaking to answer.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, if the gentleman will rise and address the Chair, he will find that he will always be treated with courtesy by me.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD rose.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. CANNON. If my time can be extended, I will answer.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Do you not know that we have 19 gunboats in the Philippines, some of which are not larger than canal boats on the Erie Canal?

Mr. CANNON. I suppose there are. Why did you not get some of those gunboats instead of expending $45,000 to expensively fit out two vessels for the coast survey of Cuba?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Because the Government paid for it with appropriations that you made.

Mr. CANNON. Why do you not use them instead of fitting out these new ones?

Now, I want to call attention to what the law is. Sections 4681 and 4682 of the Revised Statutes create the Coast Survey; that they shall survey the coast of the United States and 20 leagues at sea; that they shall also survey the land coast as well as the water and the harbors. Let me make one other observation. There is no other law, and never has been since 1834 or 1836, for survey of the coasts, when the Coast Survey was transferred from the Navy Department to the Treasury Department, until this year, and then only in an appropriation on the naval bill for this year, and it is the only appropriation that authorized the Navy Department to survey the coast anywhere. No man can find it, and yet the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague, complains because he says we are trying to take something away from the Navy. Not at all.

Mr. FOSS. Does the gentleman mean to say that we did not, under an appropriation made twenty-five years ago, under the provision for ocean and lake surveys, survey Midway Islands in the Pacific?

Mr. CANNON. I undertake to say, except in appropriations for ocean surveys, there is no law and has not been since early in the thirties authorizing the Navy to make surveys of the United States coasts until 1890, when you—I will not say surreptitiously, but without notice to the House—for the first time, without attention being called to it, inserted it in the appropriation bill for ocean "and lake" surveys. You broadened it by adding the lakes, and this has remained the law from 1890 up to the present time, except the law that is contained in the present appropriation bill for the Navy for the current year, which extends this service for this year, and for this year only, to Cuba and Porto Rico, Guam, and the Philippines.

Mr. FOSS. I would ask the gentleman when there is a general law as to ocean and lake surveys without any specific provision or limitation on it, if that does not mean surveys wherever there are oceans and wherever there are lakes?

Mr. CANNON. Where is the law?

Mr. FOSS. It has always been on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. I say again there has been no legislation except in appropriation bills, and up to 1890 it was for ocean surveys, as they went about the world, that they could take observations. Now, then, you propose in this section 16—I have no time to read it, but I make myself responsible for what I say; in section 16 you establish a full-fledged coast survey of the coast of the United States, of the newly acquired possessions, having just as much power and authority as long as this appropriation lasts, and the Coast Survey Service has to make these surveys. In other words, it creates a second coast survey under the Navy Department.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question: Whether in his judgment it is impracticable to do this work in the Navy Department?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly; and I am trying to show it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is it more expensive?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. You have not demonstrated it.

Mr. CANNON. But I have not had time. Why, I only had twenty-seven minutes, and there is an hour and a half's talk. But you can not cover it. I have not the time to do so; but I have given attention and study to this question, and I feel that I can say with more certainty than I can ordinarily about public questions that I know about this service, and I am here to state in twenty-seven minutes what it has cost me months if not years of time to investigate. It is impossible. The gentleman wants some information. I will give him a little bit. It is a fair sample of the whole thing. I have it right here.

I spoke a moment ago of the Yankton and the Eagle. One would have supposed, with three or four hundred vessels which we had scattered all over the world, that it would not have been necessary to fit up two coast-survey steamers. You would have supposed they were little yachts and gunboats belonging to the Navy to hear the gentleman from New York and my colleague from Illinois talk about them, and that all you had to do was to jump on the little yachts and go and survey by the Navy. What happened this year? This is the first year they have had this coast survey and that only in part. Why, the first thing they did was to fit up at an expense of over $45,000 the Yankton and Eagle—to do what? To survey down on the coast of Cuba and possibly a little bit in Porto Rico, commanded by naval officials.

Now, the Blake, a smaller coast-survey vessel, was engaged in surveying the coast of Porto Rico under law and under the Coast Survey. Let me make a comparison, and that will answer the question of my friend from Michigan. I have it right here.

The Blake made 70,400 soundings at a cost of 35 cents a sounding, and in addition to that the Blake triangulated and surveyed the coast or land and joined the two surveys, land and water, together.

Now, what did the Eagle and Yankton do? In the same time both of these ships, under the command of the Navy, made 25,000 soundings, just a little over one-third of what the Blake did in the same time, and while each sounding of the Blake cost 35 cents, each sounding of the Yankton and the Eagle cost $1.08.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman pardon me right there?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. The gentleman does not want to make an unfair statement.

Mr. CANNON. Well, if I can have a little more time, I will answer the gentleman; it is only a question of time.

Mr. DAYTON. Were these surveys over the same territory and involving the same difficulty in soundings? Does not the gentleman know that one piece of coast may be a thousand times more difficult to sound and survey than another?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, it may be; but it was not. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAYTON. How do you know it was not?

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, if I can have the attention of the House——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Were these soundings made the same year?

Mr. CANNON. Both the same year.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Work done at the same time?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; substantially. Now, some may say that I am abusing the Navy. I am not. The Navy fighting the battles of the Republic aboard ship and behind the guns, doing what they are educated to do, is the grandest body of men on earth. [Applause.] The Navy in civil life, in the performance of civil duties, with their training and education, are thoroughly incompetent when you get them there, and very expensive until they learn the work, and when they learn it the time comes for them to move on, to be detailed to other duty. [Laughter and applause.]

A MEMBER. That settles Dewey's canvass. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I am not talking politics, I am talking business. Now, then, I hope I can have the attention of the House, for I come to a very important matter that goes to the very bed rock of this whole matter. Take the law creating the Coast Survey.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. CANNON. I have but little time remaining.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman feel like making that broad charge against the Navy in connection with surveys?

Mr. CANNON. I said in civil life, the performance of civil duties.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I know better than the gentleman himself what he is going to say. I have but little time, but I will answer what he is going to say.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is not often that we meet with omniscience, but once in a while we strike it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. When I bring my X-ray on the gentleman it comes pretty near going through.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman had better not do it, for he does not know what he may find.

Mr. CANNON. Well, out of regard to my friend from Maine I will listen to him.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman seriously make this charge of incompetency against the officers of the Navy in connection with the survey for the purposes of navigation?

Mr. CANNON. I said incompetency in civil pursuits. I will tell my friend——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended.

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad, Mr. Chairman, to have thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman's time be extended thirty minutes.

Mr. FOSS. I suggest, if that is done, that we have an equal time on this side.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to that—not the slightest.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time for debate on this question be extended for one hour—one-half hour for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the other half to be at the disposal of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss]. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Now I will answer the question of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], and I will answer it in about two minutes, if the gentleman will give his attention.

I hold in my hand the Revised Statutes creating the Coast Survey, one provision of which is to this effect:

> The President shall carry into effect the plans of the board as agreed upon by a majority of its members, and shall cause to be employed as many officers of the Army and Navy of the United States as will be compatible with the successful prosecution of the work.

That is the law organizing the Coast Survey. Under that law there have been transferred from time to time since its enactment in 1843 nine or ten hundred officers. The average service of those officers in the Coast Survey has been a little over two years, and the facts show on examination that this wonderfully intelligent class of men, when taken from their legitimate profession, did not in the main do much more than get ready to begin the survey before the time had arrived for them to go to other duty, and they were so transferred.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to suggest that one evidence of the incompetency of naval officers in matters of civil life is that Dewey wants to be President! [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I have a great, a high admiration for Admiral Dewey.

Mr. TALBERT. So have I; but I do not want to see him seated in the Presidential chair, because he is not competent to fill it, although he is a great and efficient naval officer, deserving the admiration not only of our nation, but of the world.

Mr. CANNON. I have a high admiration for every officer and man who fought in the Spanish war or in any of our wars heretofore. I have so great an admiration and respect for these officers that when I see somebody trying to set them at work upon something that they can not economically do and can not sustain themselves in doing, I love them so well as to call a halt. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. At this point I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CANNON. If I do not in five minutes answer my friend, I will then yield.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Perhaps this might facilitate the gentleman's answer a little.

Mr. CANNON. I have the answer right here.

I have just read the provision of law for the President detailing officers of the Navy to the Coast Survey. When did he stop doing so? He first stopped in 1860. Why? Because during that great war, which lasted for five years, and also for some time afterwards, every officer of the Navy who had been doing coast-survey work or who was thought of as suitable for doing that work was transferred aboard his ship, under the flag, behind his guns, doing that for which he was educated and paid and that which brought glory upon him and his country.

Now, when did such officers come back into the Coast Survey? In the late sixties and early seventies. When did they resume their regular duties? When the Spanish war broke out; and they have been thus employed ever since.

There can not be any detail now. A week or two ago my colleague [Mr. Foss] wrote me a letter in which he informed me that the naval bill would not carry one cent of appropriation for officers of the Navy to be detailed to the Coast Survey. Why? Because the Department had not the officers to spare. And that is what the Secretary says; he has not the officers to spare. Now, in the name of all that is good, if the Department has not these officers to spare when the law says they shall be detailed, how can it have them to spare under the appropriation in the naval appropriation bill for this year, providing that such officers shall go on these two Coast Survey steamers the coming year to shoulder up the whole survey of all the coasts of our newly acquired territory?

Mr. FOSS. I will answer the question of the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. My friend has thirty minutes of his own. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is it not a fact that the Navy Department can not get men now for the new men-of-war?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I am going to refer to that. I am going to astonish this House in some respects, unless members have studied this question of the size of the Navy more thoroughly than I think some of them have.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is the gentleman ready for me now to ask my question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to make this inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois: If, according to his impression, the officers of the Navy are not qualified to do this water survey, how happens it that the Coast and Geodetic Survey has made repeated applications to the Navy Department for men to do this work under their jurisdiction?

Mr. CANNON. I have just answered that question. My friend must have gone to sleep between the time he thought of that question and the time he asked it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is that all of the gentleman's answer?

Mr. CANNON. The law—your law, my law, the law of the Navy Department and naval officers—says it shall be the duty of the President in his discretion or of the Secretary of the Navy to detail officers of the Navy to this work. He has not been performing that duty. Why? Because he has not the officers to spare.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, will the gentleman from Illinois be kind enough to answer the question—I mean the question of qualification?

Mr. CANNON. Oh! Oh! Oh! [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, I would be glad to have an answer to that.

Mr. CANNON. Now, my friend from Maine, elegant and eloquent as he is ornate, as he always is [laughter], splendid in ability and personal appearance, wants an answer to a question that has been answered far back in the course of the discussion. Why, I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that in two or three years, after careful instruction, he would become competent to command one of these Coast Survey steamers himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I assume that that is intended as a very high compliment. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. But, Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further. I want to get into the merits of this proposition.

Now, then, let us come to the matter of cost. That is the essential matter in the discussion of this proposition. Naval officers detailed prior to the Spanish war—the last year of that war—what do you suppose they cost the Government? What was the amount required to pay those who did the Coast Survey service? And I ask special attention of members of the committee to this suggestion: what did it cost to pay them for their entire service in the Coast Survey, rations and everything else? It costs $89,000 per annum. Now, what do you suppose it cost to do the same service by the employment of civil engineers—men employed from civil life—that are more competent to do this special work than were or are the naval officers on the average? I will tell you. The total cost was just $27,000. That is, the employment of men from civil life at the cost of that sum; that is to say, having a man at work when he is needed and dispensing with his services when he is not needed. Twenty-seven thousand dollars is paid for the work in one instance and $89,000 in the other; this is the difference of cost in the two systems.

I do not speak, Mr. Chairman, with any purpose of in any manner aspersing the Navy. I call attention to the fact that in the condition of our service we can not afford to detail expensive officers of the Navy to do the work of this character when we can get it done just as well, and sometimes better, and done for one-third of the money otherwise expended.

Now I am coming to the question of whether we have the officers to spare. I have got the data here, and they are official. Send to the document room and get Executive Document (Senate document) No. 168, and you will find it all worked out for your information.

We find officers on the active list in the Navy, 1,751; aggregate pay, $4,000,000 and over; 224 naval cadets, aggregate pay, $142,000 and over; 17,500 petty officers, seamen, and enlisted men, the aggregate pay being $6,300,000; 2,500 apprentice boys, $450,000, and so on and so on; in all, officers, enlisted men, boys, cadets, and so on, 21,995, the total pay of officers and men being $11,000,000.

Now, what else does the Secretary say? He says that on last February 19 there was at that time on the vessels of the United States Navy a total of 1,032 officers. That left 689 officers on land duty or somewhere else than on the sea. Now, they have land and sea service in the Navy. I inquired whether it is a matter of Department regulation or law; whether it is necessary to have six hundred and odd officers on land or not. I do not know. But they have them, and they have only 1,062 at sea on our vessels.

Now, then, the Secretary of the Navy says that there is needed to-day—that is, on February 19—to complete the complement of officers on these vessels that are at sea 210 more officers.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not all. Mind you, he is estimating 210 more for those vessels that are at sea, while to command vessels that could be put in commission within thirty days. For that purpose he wants 900 additional officers, while as this table shows, for ships under construction or in repair, it will take 867 officers more, so that it seems 3,048 officers are required to man the Navy; yet we have only 1,751 officers on the active list—in other words, we are short on officers just 1,397, and this would not leave a single officer for shore duty.

I say again, we have only 1,751 officers all told.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And need nearly twice as many.

Mr. CANNON. And need nearly twice as many to command the ships of this magnificent Navy, that my illustrious colleague is so zealous in wanting to build up. I agree with him. I hold up his hands. But, oh, my dear friend and colleague, in the light of these facts, and the shortness of officers here to man the vessels that are now in commission and that could be put in commission in thirty days, why, oh why, do you agonize to put on them this civil duty that somebody else is doing better? [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. FOSS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Well——

Mr. FOSS. Does he mean to say that the officers and men on board our ships, using our ships in the Philippines, these smaller cruisers, these smaller vessels——

Mr. CANNON. Make it short, please, my friend.

Mr. FOSS (continuing). Can not, while they are doing their naval duty, patrolling the coast, for instance, to some extent spend the larger part of their time in making these surveys?

Mr. CANNON. After a careful study that has lasted off and on through months and years, I answer that they can not, do not, and never have.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. On the average.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, I mean on the average.

Mr. FOSS. Is it not true——

Mr. CANNON. Oh!

Mr. FOSS. Well, if the gentleman objects——

Mr. CANNON. I want to be courteous always to my colleague, and I will yield.

Mr. FOSS. That is all right.

Mr. CANNON. Now, this is not all. How many men do you want to man this Navy? Speak again, Mr. Secretary of the Navy. We have now 17,500 petty officers and seamen, and, without counting the vessels for coast survey work, it will be required that we should have 17,000 additional seamen. Now, how are you going to man these coast survey vessels under the Navy? With seamen enlisted for four years. How much of the time can you spend in coast survey? Why, about a third of the year, up in Alaska. How much elsewhere? Very rarely more than from six to eight months, anywhere.

Now, the rule of the Coast Survey is that when the season is over their contracts with the sailors are up. Two or three weeks ago they were required down at Pensacola to make a survey, and instead of sending an expensive ocean steamer around there they went by rail and hired a little sailing vessel and hired the sailors then and there, and did that job in about ten days and discharged the force. With the red tape and bureaunism of our friends of the Navy, in the performance of this civil duty, they would not have got started in two or three months yet. I speak respectfully. They have to work by rule, by regulation, and have their discipline and their traditions.

Now, I want to come to this question of their competency to make charts, and I want the attention of this committee while I speak of it.

Much misinformation abounds in declamation. There is a Hydrographic Bureau, separate from this Coast Survey, under the Navy Department. It has been there for a great many years, and it is a very proper service, if they would confine themselves to the hydrographic work as the law creates it. The law does create it. I hold it in my hand here. Very briefly, the law is that this Hydrographic Bureau in the Navy Department shall make charts and issue sailing directions and all that kind of thing. It does not provide that they shall make surveys, but that they shall make charts, issue sailing directions, and so on.

Well, now, what have they done in the chart-making line? Much that is praiseworthy, much that is unnecessary. I was diverted when the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] said that the Hydrographic Office each year made 1,182 charts. Why, Lord bless you, in all the years that it has done duty, it never has printed but 1,182 charts. Do you want to know where they come from? Nine hundred and fifty-eight of these 1,100 charts were but reprints of foreign charts, which could have been bought in the foreign markets or in New York, as printed from the original plates, for less money than the Hydrographic Office could make the plates and print them. But they just reprinted them. I am not grumbling about that. It is well enough. Let the Hydrographic Office mark go on the 958 charts. But they are simply reprints of English, German, and French charts.

Well, now, that leaves some more to be accounted for. Seventeen are compiled from engineers' surveys of the lakes. What engineers' surveys of the lakes? Why, you understand how the engineers come up there on the lakes? Since 1840 the engineers have been in charge of the lakes. Why? Because there are your river and harbor improvements, changing the channels, and it was thought by Congress away back nearly sixty years ago that the Engineer Corps of the Army doing that work could make a survey of the lakes and make the charts. They have made 75 of them, and they are printed in the War Department and they are on sale. Anybody can buy them at cost, and they are amongst the best charts that were ever made on earth.

Now, then, what does your Hydrographic Bureau do? It goes to work and reprints its charts—repeats them. So to-day you can step into any engineer's office in Detroit or elsewhere and buy a lake chart, issued by the engineers of the War Department for the cost of printing; and you can step right across to the next door or the next building and buy the same chart, no better, at the cost of printing, printed by the Hydrographic Bureau. Now, we are not proposing to interfere with it. Yes; my amendment strikes the lake out and leaves it with the Army engineers. Now, with all the surveys that have been made from exploring parties and all that kind of thing, only a little over a hundred original charts have been printed and made by the Hydrographic Bureau.

Now, again the Hydrographic Bureau on the legislative bill, not on the naval bill, finds its appropriations. It has 14 branches, one at New York, one at Chicago, one at Detroit, and every dollar that will maintain the efficiency of the force of these various branch offices is there appropriated for, and every dollar asked for; yet you have been deviled to death by telegrams and letters from chambers of commerce and eminent citizens asking us to stand by the Hydrographic Office. Nobody has ever proposed to do anything else.

I do not propose to abolish the branch offices. They have got all the money that is asked for in the legislative bill. The truth is they might well be changed over. There is no use in the Hydrographic Office to sell charts under the law, for a mere clerk, at a salary of $100 a month, can keep these branch offices and sell these charts. There is no use for it; but we do not interfere with it. There is a naval officer at the head of every one, sometimes there are two, and sometimes a retired officer getting retired pay and civil pay. There is considerable of that kind of thing. I do not think it ought to exist. When a man goes on the retired list, at the age of 62 or 72 years, after having served his Government, being educated by his Government, and retired on three-fourths pay, as a mark of the esteem of a grateful country for that, it ought to be the end of his active duties so far as the Government is concerned; and some time or other I think it would be well to legislate that retired officers of the Navy, or of the Army either, should not draw that pay and in addition draw the pay of a civilian officer performing civilian duties.

Mr. Chairman, there are many other matters I would be glad to refer to, but my time has almost expired. I will refer to one or two.

The Weather Bureau, under the Agricultural Department, costs $1,000,000 annually. It is charged by law with meteorological work, and giving warning of storms, and observing the weather, issuing daily, weekly, and monthly bulletins to mariners and others. It has a thorough organization; it can reach every harbor on the Atlantic and lake coasts in forty-five minutes. Yet an investigation shows that the Navy Department is duplicating its work largely, taking its maps and bulletins by the score of pages without giving credit, and embodying them in its reports, a most expensive duplication and the duplication not as good as the original work. This should cease.

The investigations show and this debate shows that some of these Navy people also want to absorb the Life-Saving Service, the Light-House Service, the Marine-Hospital Service, the Revenue-Cutter Service—all the time not having more than half enough officers for naval service proper; and on this very bill they seek to duplicate the coast survey service. Some of them "would the whole world embrace." I say, again, it is time to call a halt and save the Navy—protect the Navy—from these wild schemes which would destroy it.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. CANNON. Well, if I may, I will reserve that four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. CANNON. I will state, however, before doing that, that there are many other things I would be glad to state here, but there is no time, and under the five-minute rule, when it comes up sentence by sentence and paragraph by paragraph, I may avail myself of the opportunity to speak further on this matter. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I make the point that the gentleman can not reserve the four minutes and use it under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves his four minutes.

Mr. FOSS. I will yield to my colleague from West Virginia such time as he desires.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the House, I first want to call attention to the fact that this is not a contest so much between the different branches of this Government as it is an attempt—and I say it meaning what I say—an attempt, in my judgment, upon the part of the Committee on Appropriations to carry on the same fight that has constantly been carried on against the Navy Department since the consideration of its appropriations have been made separate and apart from that of the general Appropriations Committee. In support of this, I want to call your attention to a statement made by Secretary Gage himself in regard to this work.

I want to emphasize the fact that he himself, the head of the Department under which the Coast and Geodetic Survey is made, is not asking that that which is being done by the Navy Department shall be cut off in this summary manner, as demanded by the gentleman who represents the Appropriations Committee. There is no division on the part of the Committee on Naval Affairs. The Committee on Appropriations—representing this Coast and Geodetic Survey, not the Navy—so far as I know, has heard but one side of it. On the other hand, the Committee on Naval Affairs has heard both sides of it, and has extended the same fair and honorable consideration to the views expressed by the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey as to those other arguments that have been brought in behalf of the Navy's jurisdiction of it.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. VANDIVER. I only ask for information. Inasmuch as the gentleman from West Virginia has stated that both sides were heard, referring to the statement made by the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, I would like to ask if he has been before the committee?

Mr. DAYTON. I understand so; his hearing is here. Why, certainly.

Mr. VANDIVER. At what time?

Mr. DAYTON. I am not prepared to state the date just now.

Mr. VANDIVER. I think the gentleman from West Virginia is mistaken.

Mr. DAYTON. Look at the hearings and you will find it there.

Mr. VANDIVER. Who was the gentleman who appeared before the committee?

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Pritchett. If the gentleman will simply turn to his book of hearings and look to it he will see that he appeared. Now, I want the House's attention to what the Secretary of the Treasury said in a letter under date of November 11, 1899, to the Secretary of the Navy about this work, from which I read this:

> In time the Coast and Geodetic Survey will doubtless publish charts of all those islands, but the Treasury Department realizes that the survey of the extended coast line of the Philippines, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Hawaiian Islands involves an enormous work, and gladly welcomes any survey work that the Navy Department may find it possible to do.

I throw his challenge back to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Here stands the Secretary of the Treasury, the head of the Coast and Geodetic Survey Bureau, asking the Navy Department to do this work. Here stands the Navy Department, that has done this work for half a century, the Navy Department, seeking to perform its function, and yet the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations demands that this shall not be done, and casts reflections on the officers of the Navy, who have always done it.

Now, another thing. I wish the gentleman would listen to this further statement. Up to the last few years not one particle of the survey of the sea has been done except by a naval officer, and he talks about the expense of it and has sought to draw a comparison as to that expense. Let me tell him further that the only reason why the expense has been reduced is simply because the vessels have been manned by naval officers and by naval seamen; and their pay has come out of what? Out of the pay and the expenses of the Navy and nothing else.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend allow me?

Mr. DAYTON. The gentleman was not very courteous to me, but I will yield to him.

Mr. CANNON. If I was discourteous to the gentleman, he will understand it was not in my inner heart to be discourteous.

Mr. DAYTON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. No; I will take time in my own right.

Mr. DAYTON. The gentleman from Illinois speaks with assurance of long knowledge and seeks to impress on this House that it must be true because he has studied these matters. I want to say to him that others have given the best thought that they are capable of in the study of these questions. I want to call members' attention to the fact that the Coast and Geodetic Survey, from its inception in 1807, ninety-three years ago, was organized, and under its organic law it was provided that so far as possible the hydrographic part of the work must be done by naval officers. And it has been so done, not by the three or four hundred naval officers that the gentleman speaks of, but by a detail of over 1,200 naval officers since 1832, and up to last year not one particle of the survey of the sea itself was done by any other than a naval officer. Here is the act. Gentlemen need not take my statement of it.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Is not that the kind of work that the Secretary means to welcome and not the coast survey?

Mr. DAYTON. The very terms of the act limited the coast survey to the United States coast, and the language of the Secretary is clear that he recognizes that the work in Porto Rico and Hawaii and the Philippine Islands will be so enormous that he would gladly welcome any work that could be done there by the Navy Department.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Has the Navy undertaken any topographical work?

Mr. DAYTON. No; it has been doing the hydrographic work; doing it under a bureau constituted by law. Why, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois places himself in direct contradiction to Webster's Dictionary; he has forgotten the definition and the meaning of the word. In 1866 Congress established a Hydrographic Bureau.

Now, he says that was for the sole purpose of publishing maps and charts and sending them out, and not for the survey of the sea, notwithstanding the very definition of hydrography is that it is a survey of the sea. I have the definition here: "The act of measuring and describing the sea, lakes, rivers, and other waters with their phenomena; second, that branch of surveying which embraces the determination of the contour of the bottom of a harbor or other sheet of water, the depth of soundings, the position of channels and shoals, with the construction of charts exhibiting these phenomena."

That bureau was established as a Bureau of Hydrography in connection with the Navy Department, and has been doing this work since 1866; and this Congress, without a word of objection, appropriated last year this same sum of money—$100,000—because the gentleman from Illinois up to that time was not in the position that he is now of being able to extend the jurisdiction of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, which by the act that created it in 1807 was limited to the United States coast, 20 leagues at sea and 5 miles inland. But they gave us an appropriation bill last year that by new legislation did extend it, and now he wants to throw out his tentacles and gather in all in sight, as he usually does when it comes to a question of controlling legislation on the floor of this House.

Gentlemen, I want to call your attention to the fact that as members of the Naval Committee we stand here and simply ask for what has been done over and over again. We have made one mistake, and only one. That mistake was in not having the chairman of the Naval Committee standing here last year with all his material, supervising and seeking to direct and control the legislation coming from the Appropriations Committee. Because of that oversight the jurisdiction of this Coast and Geodetic Survey was permitted to be extended in that way.

It has taken this Bureau ninety-three years to furnish us—what? A survey of the Atlantic coast and the Gulf and the Pacific coast. Now, when you remember that they have got Alaska before them, tell me, in the name of justice and right—tell me, in the name of common sense, how long will it take them to survey these islands of the sea?

In the meantime, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to the fact that our vessels are over there; a very large part of our fleet is over there. Charts have been handed down to us from Spain—charts false, defective, and in many cases entirely unreliable. As a result of this we have already lost the Charleston, which cost us, in round numbers, $1,600,000; and if we wait a century longer for the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and his Coast and Geodetic Survey, how many more vessels will we lose there?

You can see the reason why the Secretary of the Navy and the head of the Bureau of Equipment and the Secretary of the Treasury all gladly welcome additional work to be done here. You can see why it is necessary; you can see why it is called for.

Ah, but gentlemen say that the Navy Department is ineffective, incompetent to do this work. If that is true—and I hope I may have the attention of gentlemen while I read the facts from a statement made from official sources—if that is true, why has it always done this work? I want to read this because when the gentleman denies it I want to be able to say that my statements of facts come from the RECORD and not from my own faulty recollection. When it comes to recollecting things and when it comes to stating personal knowledge, I want to say that the gentleman can outdistance anybody on this floor:

There is a well-defined line between the hydrographic work and the topographical and shore work of the Bureau. No work is done by the civil officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey so far as the survey of the water goes. The Coast and Geodetic Survey was at one time under the charge of an officer of the Navy Department.

Now, as to the question of cost. The gentleman made jest of my question and, as usual, when it comes to answering a question that answers him so completely that he has no answer to make, he, with his long experience, turns off the question with a wave of his hand. I say this, my friends—and you will find it out as you go along seeking to break up this Navy of ours—you will find that some of us, if we remain here, are determined that the Navy shall not be dismembered into a parcel of little, paltry, petty navies, but that it shall be one grand Navy, worthy of the American people.

Here is where your item of expense is concerned. You went on and referred to the different soundings of the different vessels. You wanted to show that the coast and geodetic work was the greater. You knew at the time, or ought to have known, that the soundings depended upon the character of the particular piece of water or coast that was being surveyed; that one piece of water or coast would take sometimes five times as long for the survey as another.

But you speak about lack of men. We can get men in the Navy. But what do you lack? I make the statement, and I challenge you to deny it, that you have in connection with the Coast and Geodetic Survey but a single poor, pitiful vessel that is capable of doing this work to-day; and I say to you that unless you come to the Navy for assistance you have nothing to do this work with. You have not the vessels to put the men on to do the work. On this point I read from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury what the head of your Bureau says:

The condition of the vessels on the Atlantic coast, owing to their age and hard service, has already been reported to the Secretary of the Treasury, and recognized by him in certain recommendations to Congress; that the steamer A. D. Bassett be rebuilt, and that a small additional steamer for the use of the coast pilot be provided. At present the G. S. Blake is the only seaworthy steamer on the Atlantic coast. The rehabilitation of this small fleet is urgently required in the interest of economy.

You may have a vessel or two over in the Philippines. I understand, however, that you have none. Now, then, gentlemen, let me ask you, is it better for us to go out and employ our men regularly through the Navy Department, have them regularly trained as landsmen and put on board the vessels of the United States—is it better for us to do that than for us to go to work and build up another navy for the Coast and Geodetic Survey? That is what this question means. That will come along next year, and my friend will then have the pleasure of asking for the construction of vessels for the Coast Survey.

We are building up too many little side navies, Mr. Chairman. We have one, or rather a part of one, which is used for the Coast and Geodetic Survey. We are told that we want another for the Fish Commission. There is still another desired for the revenue service, and still another for the transport service. All these establishments and branches of the naval service are to be supported from the main body of the service and to be independent of it, and to be placed under the control of the Treasury Department, if you please, which comes under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have already consumed more time than I intended to. I simply will epitomize the facts: First, that nobody makes this fight here. The Secretary of the Treasury does not make it, but by his own word gladly welcomes the appropriation and asks for it. The Secretary of the Navy welcomes the appropriation and asks for it. The united Committee on Naval Affairs, having gone through it all, from one end to the other, recommends it. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] stands here against the judgment of all these.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that neither he nor anyone else can control a matter of so much importance as this. I believe that nothing that he or anyone else can say against the American Navy can stand in the nature of an assault upon that establishment. It is competent on land or on sea. His very argument in support of the position he takes is condemned by the statement I have read, from the facts and the records showing that the work that he says they are incompetent to do has been done by it for years. And with this statement of the facts in the case I submit this matter for the consideration of the committee, and trust that it will not be misled by these constant assaults upon the recommendation, of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that has gone to the very bottom of this whole matter and has studied it carefully, thoroughly, and fully, and has stated as earnestly as any other set of men could state what they believe to be the best interests of the service in this connection. They have given you in their report in regard to this bill their best information and judgment. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MAHON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. R. 115. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to cause bronze medals to be struck and distributed to certain officers and men who participated in the war with Spain, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3436) entitled "An act granting a pension to Catharine Weinheimer."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the Senate concurrent resolution No. 19, "to print and bind 2,000 copies of the message of the President transmitting the treaty of peace with Spain," etc.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the Senate concurrent resolution No. 18, "to print 5,000 copies of the report of Capt. W. R. Abercrombie on the Copper River exploration expedition to Alaska," etc.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4001) authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on the Navajo Indian Reservation, Territory of Arizona.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 235) authorizing the exhibit of Government relics at the New York Printing Exposition, from May 2 to June 2, 1900.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I would ask how much time there is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. DINSMORE. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, I desire to submit some brief observations on this question, and I wish to suggest, if he does not desire to use the remaining time, that he would yield to me at least a portion of it.

Mr. FOSS. I have but four minutes remaining.

Mr. DINSMORE. I wish to put the House in possession of one or two matters that I thought were of importance in this connection.

Mr. FOSS. I yield to the gentleman such time as I may have remaining.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I am reluctant to use the balance of the time remaining to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOSS. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I have so much respect for the judgment and earnestness of the three gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee—the chairman [Mr. CANNON], my colleague from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY]—that I have listened with a great deal of care to the arguments which they have made to-day in support of their contentions. I know they are earnest; and I had believed that if I followed their argument I might receive some information which might perhaps change the view which I already entertained with reference to this question, but I have listened in vain. I think this work should be done by the Navy. I think so because the naval officers are more competent to do it, rather than incompetent, as contended by the gentlemen, and that it can be done more cheaply by the naval branch of the service; that it should be so done because the law to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] referred a while ago itself says so. The language of the law itself is that the hydrographic work is to be done by the Navy and the topography by the Army.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to put the House in possession of this fact: There is not a book upon the subject of hydrography that has not been written by a naval officer, neither in the English language nor in any other language. Every book which is used in the service was prepared by a naval officer; all the books used by the Coast and Geodetic Survey were written by naval officers. The officers were selected by the law because they were thought to be more competent; and I think, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Illinois has but a poor conception of the naval officer of the United States if he regards him as a mere gladiator, trained for the purpose of contest in war. He is given a high degree of education and fitted for scientific work. This is a part of his work. It is one of the best courses known to any of the scientific schools, and these men are especially and specifically qualified for it by their educational training. Not only so, Mr. Chairman, but naval officers have done the best part of the hydrographic work that has been done for this country.

Mr. BALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINSMORE. I have only a few moments, and I would rather not be interrupted. They have done the work, and they are qualified for it by their education. Gentlemen say that they are fine in war. They have great respect for the naval officer, they say, but he is a mere fighting machine. On the contrary, sir, in these modern times of progress and civilization, science enters into warfare, and he is made to use his intellect more than his arms. Even upon his ship his intellect is that which gives force to his country's cause more than his arms. This work should be kept where it properly belongs, and that is in the Navy, for the reason, moreover, that it can be done with less expense, as I humbly believe, contrary to the opinion expressed by these gentlemen who are members of the Committee on Appropriations.

We do have the ships—but they say now that a short time ago they were not available for use—but it is to be hoped, Mr. Chairman, that we may not always be engaged in war. In time of peace these ships can be assigned to this work, and can do it with less expense than new fleets can be fitted out and new officers created and commissioned and put into service. Mr. Chairman, there is behind this—I do not mean to impute this to any gentlemen who advocate the cause of the Coast and Geodetic Survey—there is behind it a desire to promote this Bureau, to give it more standing and recognition in the law, looking ultimately to permanent rank and retired pay. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in the three or four minutes I have I can only say to my very good friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] that he resorts in his contention not to the merits of this provision, but he seeks to make this a question of committees. I never yet heard that because a man was on a committee he ceased to be a member of the House. Must I bow and beg pardon when I speak to a bill that affects my constituency, a bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs? Must I stop my judgment and not perform my duty as a member of the House? Clearly not. Now, much has been said about the glory of the Navy by my friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON], and I really felt very small when he said that I was trying to break up this Navy. Who constituted him the sole defender of the Navy? [Laughter and applause.] It comes with ill grace.

Now, here is a great public service. They say that there never has been a yard of the water surveyed that the work was not done by naval officers. Yet for nearly ten years, during the civil war and after the civil war, no naval officer was upon this work, and yet the Coast Survey never did so much work as during those ten years. No naval officer is on this work now, or has been since the war with Spain broke out; and since the war closed the Secretary of the Navy has refused, and to-day refuses, to comply with the law and detail an officer of the Navy—not one. He says he has not got them to spare, and proves that he needs fifteen hundred more officers to properly care for the ships in commission and that could be put in commission in thirty days.

And yet they have organized a partial coast survey for this year by an appropriation in the naval bill for this year and they come now with this proposition and propose—and I speak advisedly, after having studied this provision—to organize a coast-survey service in the Navy that is a duplicate of the coast-survey service under the Treasury, not only as to the newly acquired Territories but as to every mile of our coast of the United States proper, and they say that we are interfering. Oh, I am interfering, so far as my voice and my vote goes, and my commission from my constituency reads exactly the same as the gentleman's commission from his constituency. They say we have been nearly a hundred years in making survey of our coast. Yes, and a hundred years more and twice a hundred years will cease before this work is done.

Why, they have a civil establishment under the Admiralty, under the naval establishment, and have had in Great Britain for one hundred and twenty years, and they are doing more surveying of the coast to-day than they did at any other time. The tides are constantly changing, the water changes, the channel changes; and I will talk about that, if necessary, a little later on. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. An effort has been made, Mr. Chairman, by some gentlemen who have participated in this debate to make it appear that this is a mere contention as to jurisdiction between the Committee on Appropriations on the one hand and the Naval Committee on the other; a contest for control between the Navy Department on the one hand and the Treasury Department on the other. I take it for granted that so far as the members of this House are concerned it is of little importance to them under which Department this branch of the service is placed. What we are concerned in is an effort to secure an economical administration of the work belonging to this Bureau. We do not wish a duplication of bureaus; we do not wish a duplication of work. We think that efficiency of work and economy of administration demand that work should be conducted by one bureau, under one control.

The question then arises as to whether we shall in this bill sanction a provision which creates an additional bureau where one already exists having jurisdiction of this work, and which necessarily creates a duplication of work and embarrassment of administration. So far as the contention between the Departments is concerned, that contention is as old as the Government. The Coast and Geodetic Survey was first placed under the control of the Treasury Department, and remained there for twenty or twenty-five years. It was then placed by Congress under the Navy Department, and the administration of it was so unsatisfactory there that, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, it was retransferred to the Treasury Department.

Again, by Executive order, by order of the President of the United States, this Bureau was put under the control of the Navy Department, and by the same President, upon the transfer of the Secretary of the Navy to the Secretaryship of the Treasury, this Bureau was again retransferred to the Treasury Department. Commissions have sat upon this question and have refused to change the administration from the Treasury Department to the Navy Department. The matter has been thoroughly sifted by repeated Congresses, by repeated commissions, by repeated joint action of joint committees. We have this capable and efficient Coast and Geodetic Survey authorized under the law to call upon the Navy when it has officers to spare for a detail of those officers to hydrographic work, a survey not devoted solely to the hydrographic work of the coast, but also in the geodetic survey of the shore, and I claim that there can be no intelligent administration of the hydrographic work of the coast unless the control of the survey of the shore itself is in the same hands.

The Committee on Naval Affairs propose now to separate these practically and to transfer the water work to the Navy, leaving the shore work to the Coast Survey. They say that in every other country in the world, except Portugal and Belgium, the hydrographic work is done under the control of the navy. That may be true. It is true so far as England is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask an extension of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is true so far as England is concerned. But if you propose to inquire further, you will find that the Bureau, whilst under the Navy Department and under the control of an admiral of the Navy, is really a civil bureau; that the officers in the Hydrographic Bureau are not men who are detailed to sea service, but are devoted for life to hydrographic work. Gentlemen here propose that the naval officers shall have dual duties, their duties as officers to command ships, part of the great machinery of war, being their primary duties, and their secondary duties being the duties of this work, which can be discharged by civilians, by trained civilians, of less capacity than the officers of the Navy, men who, by reason of training in a specialty, are better prepared to do this work than are the naval officers by spasmodic and interrupted effort.

They have a civil bureau under the control of the Navy Department; and I contend that if you intend to make a change, the logical thing to do is to take the Coast and Geodetic Survey from the Treasury Department and place it under the Navy Department, and then you will have no duplication of work and a practical concentration of control and administration. But I should be opposed to that. I am opposed to the absorption of civil duties by the military. No one surpasses me in admiration for the great achievements of our Navy and of our Army, but I believe in confining both to military duties.

I do not believe in allowing them to absorb duties that belong to civil bureaus. If you say that this belongs to the Navy, why does not the revenue marine belong to the Navy; why does not the Light-House Board belong to the Navy? There are three or four hundred ships of the Navy and there are three or four thousand ships that belong to the merchant marine. I believe that the marine board, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Light-House Board, all belong to the civil administration of the Government, and should remain under the control of the Treasury Department until the department of commerce is organized to relieve the Department of its superabundance of work and of duty.

Now, what do I claim? I claim that this work can be run more economically by the civil administration. They speak of the Bureau not having ships enough at command. Why, they do not have to buy ships or build ships for this purpose; they can employ temporarily small vessels, steam or sailing vessels, and then, the work being accomplished, dismiss them; they can employ men temporarily and dismiss them. Besides, recollect that we are called upon to transfer the Bureau to the Navy Department at a time when the fighting men of our naval machinery are unequal to the task imposed upon them. Sixteen vessels have gone out of commission because the Secretary of the Navy does not have officers to assign to them.

In a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, which I have seen, the statement is made that there are about 1,600 officers now in the Navy, and that for the ships now in contemplation a force of 3,000 officers will be required. So that to-day, judging by the present requirements and the requirements of the immediate future, there is a deficiency of 1,400 officers in the naval service. Now, what I insist upon is either that one Department or the other should control this work—either the Navy or the Treasury Department; that you should not split the work now; that if it is the sentiment of the House that this Bureau should be transferred to the Navy Department, let it be by a bill specially brought to the House for the purpose, so that the efficiency of the civil part of the Government shall not be impeded by a duplicate bureau that will create friction and embarrassment between the two Departments of the Government.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I have only a few words I want to say, and first I want to reply to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who referred to a letter I had written to him with reference to detailing men for the Coast Survey. I desire to state that the Navy Department has said that it has no more men for detail to the Coast and Geodetic Survey, but while that is true, the gentleman will recognize that there is a difference between detailing men and officers of the Navy for another department to do surveying work and using the men and officers upon their own ships, in their own department, to do the survey work. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SOUTHARD. If the gentleman will allow me, is that done anywhere, by anybody in any part of the Navy?

Mr. FOSS. By any other country?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Is that method pursued in making surveys by any other country?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Where?

Mr. FOSS. England.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSS. Every foreign country except Portugal has a distinct survey under the head of the navy department.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Yes; but their bureau there is entirely civilian in personnel.

Mr. FOSS. Entirely civilian; the gentleman is correct. But does the gentleman understand the difference between the education of a naval officer in this country and the education of a naval officer abroad? We educate our naval officers upon the broad plan of seamanship, of gunnery, of navigation, of surveying, and all those things which enter into the profession of a naval officer. England specializes, and, consequently, she has navigating engineers. She has her hydrographic engineers. Germany in her navy has a corps of professors, but that is due to the specialization of the education on the part of the naval officers. Our naval officers are especially fitted to do this work; and because of the fact that they have been doing it in the Coast and Geodetic Survey up to the time of the war demonstrates that they are able to do it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we are not trying to abolish the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman pardon me for a suggestion? The gentleman is undoubtedly aware that our Coast and Geodetic Survey enjoys the very highest reputation abroad among the scientists of Europe, of all civilized countries in Europe, who regard that survey as of so high a value as to render it, in my judgment, the pride of every American citizen.

Mr. FOSS. I will say that the Hydrographic Bureau of the Navy Department is infinitely higher in the estimation of the foreign navies than the Coast and Geodetic Survey. Why? Because the Coast and Geodetic Survey has been doing their service upon the polyconic system, which is not recognized in any foreign navy or in any foreign merchant marine.

Now, gentlemen, we are not seeking to abolish the Coast and Geodetic Survey. Here are two great Departments having concurrent jurisdiction in this matter. Under the original act providing for the Coast and Geodetic Survey, their services were to be confined to the coast of the Atlantic, the Gulf, and Alaska, and until that provision of law was put in here on the sundry civil bill by the Committee on Appropriations there was smooth sailing, and everything went along all right just like "a painted ship upon a painted ocean." But when they put that provision in there they extended the jurisdiction of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and took away what has always been the undisputed right of the American Navy—the right to make the surveys of the ocean and of the islands in the ocean.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSS. I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman for two minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. I say to you, gentlemen, that every consideration of justice, every principle of common decency, every consideration of humanity demands that when you intrust these armed cruisers and these battle ships and all the ships of our Navy to the hands of naval officers and seamen and hold them responsible for the safe conduct of the ships over the ocean—when you expect them to know every rock, and every reef, and every shoal—in the name of common justice you ought to give them the right to make the surveys for the uncharted seas. [Applause.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. FOSS] has said that because the ships of the Navy are in the hands of the naval officers therefore they ought to be given the work of the surveys. There is no more analogy in such an argument than there would be if one should say that the engineer on the train ought to construct the track. These are works of distinct characters, and there is no more reason why an officer whose duty it is to sail a vessel should make the surveys than to say that it should be his duty to make the ship itself.

Mr. FOSS. Do you not think the officer would be a better navigator if he made the surveys?

Mr. SHAFROTH. He can not do everything in the world; he can not have the most perfect knowledge upon all subjects; he is not omnipotent and omniscient; and for that reason special knowledge upon these matters, obtained by a lifetime devoted to them, must of necessity, according to human experience, produce better results.

Mr. FOSS. Does the gentleman mean to say that the officer does not get at the Naval Academy an education fitting him for this kind of work?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; he gets an education, just as we get an education in our colleges—a very proficient education. But what is the aspiration of an officer in the Navy? Is it to do surveying? No. If we had in the Navy officers with that kind of ambition, they would not be worth anything. The officer of a naval vessel, if he is the right kind of a man, has ambition to take command of a ship, a large ship, a fleet, to be ultimately an admiral; that is what makes a good naval officer, and that is the reason he can not devote his time to this special technical work; that is the reason the specialist, the man who is skilled in this kind of work, ought to do better work.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, we have a law which authorizes the Coast and Geodetic Survey to survey the coast of Porto Rico, Cuba, the Philippine Islands, and Hawaii. We find in this bill a provision for the Navy Department to undertake the same surveys. If you adopt that provision and it becomes law, you are bound to have some duplication of work. There is in this section a provision that part of this appropriation can be spent by the Navy Department in making surveys in the Hawaiian Islands and in Porto Rico; and at the same time I find by the report of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey that that work has been nearly completed by his department, and will be completed in less than four weeks from this time. When you have two distinct departments and confer concurrent jurisdiction upon each, you are necessarily bound to have conflicts. Consequently it is bad policy thus to duplicate the jurisdiction of two different departments of the Government. One or the other ought to fall. There ought not to be such a thing as two bureaus having jurisdiction over the same subject-matter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, which is the better system of surveys—is the naval process better or is the system of the Coast and Geodetic Survey superior? The Navy Department makes what it calls hydrographic surveys only—that is, surveys of the surface of bodies of water and the contour of the bottoms thereof. The Coast and Geodetic Survey makes not only hydrographic but also topographic surveys. Which is best for the nation? Why, Mr. Chairman, although we have a great regard for the safety of our Navy, we must also have regard for our merchant marine. We must remember that there are 3,000 merchant-marine vessels plying to and from our ports, many of which are in coastwise trade, landing at insignificant harbors, while the Navy has but 225 vessels, many of them spending the most time in foreign waters. We must remember that when this Coast and Geodetic Survey makes a survey it does it not only for our naval vessels, but also for our merchant marine.

It must be taken into consideration that if naval officers should make exclusively the surveys under the Navy Department, they would naturally put more stress and give more importance to the large ports, where their vessels are likely to go, and would consequently slight the other ports where small merchant vessels would land. I do not say this by way of disparagement of our naval officers. Such a thing is natural; it is a condition that exists in human nature. Whatever we regard as most important will receive the most attention, and we always regard the things we are most interested in as the most important. That is true with us, and equally true with officers of the Navy. For that reason I do not think under the management of the Navy Department the coast and harbors visited only by the merchant marine would receive as much attention as they do now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Colorado for five minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the difference between the work of these two branches of the service? As I said before, the Navy undertakes the hydrographic surveys only. The Coast and Geodetic Survey undertakes both hydrographic and topographic work, doing the two classes of work concurrently. They use vessels which are not such as our naval vessels. They do not take vessels of great tonnage. The tonnage of their vessels is small—between 20 tons and 400 tons. They take a party of men and land them on shore, for instance, on the Porto Rican coast. Then they keep a certain number of the men on the vessel. In order to get the location of their soundings, they must reckon from points or signals on the land, and while the men on the vessels are making soundings the men on shore are making topographic surveys. They—the two forces—thus go all around the island making a complete topographic and hydrographic survey as they go. These topographic surveys are of great service to both the Army and the Navy. The indication on a map that a certain section of the land is marshy or contains deep ravines often becomes of vital importance in military operations. From the maps furnished by the Coast and Geodetic Survey which gave accurate distances and elevations relative to Fort Jackson, Admiral Porter was able to bombard that fort with complete effect, although a forest rendered his view of the fort impossible.

Mr. FOSS. May I ask the gentleman a question? Does he think that we are attempting to abolish the Coast and Geodetic Survey?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; but I say that, in my judgment, one or the other ought to fall in order to have the most efficient service.

Mr. FOSS. Can not the work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey go on on the coast of this country, and can not the Navy look after the surveys of our insular possessions?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The law is that each one has jurisdiction, and consequently we can not control where the Coast and Geodetic Survey shall work and where the Navy Department shall work.

Mr. FOSS. How did they get jurisdiction—on the last sundry civil bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. One may say it was done surreptitiously, and the other that in the naval bill of last year the appropriation for the Navy to do such work was overlooked; but the law now is that the Coast and Geodetic Survey have jurisdiction to survey those islands, as to both topography and hydrography, and that being the case, you are bound to have a conflict of surveys if you are going to authorize this provision.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. SHAFROTH. My time is limited, but I will yield.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You can get a little more time. You say the law now authorizes the Coast and Geodetic Survey to go over this territory. Will you be kind enough to point out to the House the provision of the statute that authorizes them to survey the Philippine Archipelago?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, it has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois——.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman please point us to the provision of the statute.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] has stated that it was contained in the last general appropriation bill; that it was authorized under the sundry civil bill of last year.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That was the first time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It makes no difference when was the first time. It is the law now. That is the point, and consequently this Coast and Geodetic Survey has the power to do the work, unless you cripple it. It would be far better that the Coast and Geodetic Survey should be abolished, and that the whole work should be in the hands of the Navy Department, than that we should have two bureaus, independent of each other, with concurrent jurisdiction and each having the right to do the work of the other.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Have they done anything under that appropriation in the Philippines?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know. I think some preparation has been made, but whether it has done anything or not, the law authorizes it, and we can not change it in this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, they are continually saying that the Navy has got the ships and that they can do it without any extra cost. It is true the Navy has a great many ships, but they are not the kind of ships that are used in coast surveys. The ships that are used in surveys by the Coast and Geodetic Survey are from 20 to 400 tons only, and half of them are sailing vessels. I should like to see where you would get a contented officer of the Navy with any ambition in him who would want to spend a year or two on a sailing vessel of 20 to 400 tons. Mr. Chairman, it is not natural for them to do it. But when you take a man who is skilled in this work, who makes it his life work, his ambition, he will do a great deal more efficient work than a man will whose ambition is something else and whose ambition ought to be something else.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are two propositions that present themselves with respect to this matter on which I would like to be heard. First, can you get more efficient service under the Coast and Geodetic Survey? If you can, then we ought to have it. Second, are the surveys more economical under the Coast and Geodetic Survey than under the Navy? Those are the two propositions that ought to control us, and if we can convince the House upon those two points, then the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois ought to be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to have a little more time.

Mr. FOSS. I move that debate upon this paragraph and the amendment be closed. We have been debating it all day long, and I should like to have a vote.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOSS. I ask that the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16 strike out all of lines 1 to 23 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Ocean surveys: For special ocean surveys and the publication thereof, $10,000."

Mr. FOSS. I should like to state that this is the amendment introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. That is my amendment that I hope will be adopted.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FOSS) there were—ayes 111, noes 40.

So the amendment of Mr. CANNON was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last evening a point of order was pending against the paragraph at the close of page 33, making an appropriation for a building suitable for use as cadet quarters at the Annapolis Academy. The point of order raised against this proposition was that it was new legislation, and it was stated that in former appropriation bills provision had been made for the building of new buildings at Annapolis, including this one, and that a limit of cost had been fixed amounting to $1,200,000; that Congress had appropriated at one time $500,000 and at another time $700,000, or the full limit of the appropriation.

The Chair has examined the former appropriation bills, on which appropriations were made, and finds that those appropriations and that limit were for specific buildings, none of which included cadet quarters or quarters suitable for cadets, which is the only item appropriated for or included in this particular portion of this bill. So that the Chair concludes that there is nothing in that previous legislation to limit the amount of the appropriation for this particular item in the bill.

The point is also made that this is new legislation and is not in continuance of a public work already in progress. The Chair finds that there have been several rulings upon similar propositions. There was one made in the Fiftieth Congress on a proposition to appropriate for a building at the West Point Military Academy. It was held there by the then presiding officer and acquiesced in without any appeal from any member of the committee at that time that the appropriation was in order, the decision of the Chairman, Mr. Cox, of New York, being in the following words:

The Chair decides that within the meaning of the provision just read the building proposed to be erected—"fireproof building on site of public grounds at West Point"—is within the purview of the rule. The construction of a building is an incident to the maintenance of the Academy itself, the object being already in progress—the main object contemplated not only by the bill, but by the very institution of the Academy itself.

Two years ago when a proposition was made in the naval appropriation bill to build some other buildings at Annapolis, the same point of order was raised, and the gentleman who was then in the chair, Mr. SHERMAN of New York, ruled as follows:

The Chair, following the precedent cited, the decision of Chairman Cox, will overrule the point of order.

So that there are these two decisions that were acquiesced in by the House at the time, no one appealing from the decision of the Chair.

The Chair finds that there are other decisions, one on an item in the Indian appropriation bill only a short time ago, in 1897, the Chair thinks. It was proposed to build a manual training school at one of the Indian reservations, and that was proposed as a part of a work in progress, namely, the educating of the Indians. But that particular proposition was ruled out on a point of order.

Of course there are the familiar illustrations of propositions to build dry docks, which have been held to be not in order where they required the purchase of the land, and where the work was not in progress in any sense of the word. If this was an original proposition before the House, the Chair then would not be in accord with the former rulings, which he has cited above. The Chair is inclined to think that those points were not fully discussed before the committee; in neither of these cases was there much discussion before the committee and in the presence of the Chair. It is a case of breaking over the rules. Precedents have been established.

The Chair would not, if called upon to rule in the case of a public building—of a post-office, for instance, tearing down a post-office at a given city and building another one on the same lot—the Chair would not rule that such a proposition was in order. If this were a new proposition, the Chair would hesitate to declare it in order, but the Chair feels bound to follow the precedents that have been set and acquiesced in by Congress, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, what is the page?

The CHAIRMAN. It is at the bottom of page 33, and down to line 5, on page 34.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to offer an amendment, following after line 5.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "dollars" in line 5, page 34, the following:

"Provided, That this sum shall be so expended as not to involve a total greater expenditure than $6,000,000, including the sums herein appropriated and the sum of $1,220,000 heretofore appropriated, for all new buildings and improvements at the Naval Academy."

Mr. MUDD. I reserve the point of order upon that.

Mr. CANNON. I think it is not subject to the point of order, but I will speak to the merits. It limits the expenditure of this money, and the necessity for it is as follows—and I crave the attention of this committee: This provision as it is in the bill provides for a building suitable for use as cadet quarters, at a cost not to exceed $2,500,000. That is cadet quarters. They have already had $1,200,000. Now, this has to be followed by an armory, officers' quarters, and so on, and so on; and I am informed, by men that claim to know, that the whole plan as drawn by the architect so far as constructed—and it is pursuance of the plan—will make the improvement at Annapolis for the Naval Academy when complete cost $12,000,000.

Now, then, in other words, they escaped the point of order. They call it "a public work in progress." They get an architect, who lays out $12,000,000 worth of work in buildings and improvements for our Naval Academy, and then they come in and appropriate building by building. Already $1,200,000 has gone. Now, I undertake to say that while this Naval Academy should be sufficient in every respect for the comfort and utility of that great school, there is no excuse for going beyond a sufficient plan. Why, stop and think a minute. Two millions and a half for cadet quarters! Built of what? Finished how? Fancy! This great library, the Library of Congress, over here only cost, in round numbers, $6,000,000, nearly half as much as it is proposed to provide for cadet barracks that house in the barracks how many men? Two hundred and forty-five. That is the number. You know one-third of them are at sea and there are only 245 there at any one time.

Now, how much per cadet in the barracks? Ten thousand dollars for each of the 245 cadets to house him in the barracks! Well, now, of the $12,000,000, when expended, how much per cadet to house all the people? Forty-nine thousand dollars is the exact cost to accommodate each naval cadet! Now, then, I will say to you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this House, that your constituency and my constituency, while they are proud of the Navy and wants sufficient buildings, they are not in favor of that kind of expenditure.

Now, what does my amendment do? It provides that in constructing these barracks they shall be so constructed as not to involve an expenditure of over six million dollars instead of twelve; and I am going to follow that with an amendment, if it is adopted, to cut down the cadet barracks from two millions and a half, which is authorized, to one million; and that is enough. [Applause.] I will just modify my amendment by striking out two and a half millions and inserting one million, and then putting on this proviso. Ah, gentlemen, it is grand and splendid to follow the flag——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2, page 34, strike out the words "two million five hundred thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one million;" and also insert after the word "dollars," in line 5, page 34:

"Provided, That this sum shall be so expended as not to involve a total greater expenditure than $6,000,000, including the sums herein appropriated and the sum of $1,220,000 heretofore appropriated, for all new buildings and improvements at the Naval Academy."

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I quite concur in the views of the gentleman from Illinois regarding the amount of this appropriation. When this measure was before the House in a former Congress I voted for it when it was a matter of much contention, although I thought then that the amount, $1,200,000, provided for the building then in contemplation was too large; but I was desirous of seeing the Naval Academy started, and at that time the contention was as to whether it should be started or not, and for that reason I voted for the amendment to the bill offered by the gentleman from Maryland, an amendment which was carried in the House.

Now, this measure proposes to appropriate $2,500,000 for cadet buildings. I think that amount is too much. When I recall the simplicity of my college days, I can not but deplore the luxury of life that has crept into the lives of our students throughout the country, largely as the result of the mistaken generosity of people making large benefactions. I think a life of almost Spartan simplicity is better suited to the health of the youth of this country than a life of luxury, and I believe that the best training for a man who is to enter either the Army or the Navy is a life of Spartan simplicity. Such simplicity of life develops the very qualities that are needed in the men who are to fight our battles—the heroic qualities, qualities of strength and endurance.

Now, here it is proposed to erect a palace for about 300 cadets, and the bill involves and practically appropriates $80,000 for a house for each cadet. Of course we want these buildings constructed in such a way that they will be a credit to the country from an architectural point of view. We wish them to have every convenience, to be perfect in sanitation, but we do not wish them to be palaces leading to luxury of life, leading to dissatisfaction with the harsh conditions which will come upon the young men later on when they enter upon their career. I think the limitation of six millions for all the buildings is an ample appropriation, and a million dollars for the cadet quarters, aggregating $30,000 for a house for each cadet, is certainly a most generous allowance for this purpose.

[Mr. MUDD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire very much to vote with this committee on all of its propositions; but I want to say frankly to them that it seems to me that this is extravagance run mad. I have just consulted my colleague from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY] who, more than any other one man, has been connected with the construction of the buildings of Yale University and is perfectly familiar with them.

Gentlemen speak of the Academy buildings being of brick or stone. There is no university in this country with more elegant buildings than those which stand on the campus at New Haven. They are constructed of stone, and we both agree that the total cost of all these dormitories of Yale University, giving a capacity of 1,800 to 2,000 students, will not equal the cost of this grand building which you propose to construct for 350 cadets at Annapolis. I even include the $1,000,000 given by Mr. Vanderbilt for the Vanderbilt Hall at Yale College.

It seems to me that it is extravagance run mad; and it is unwise, injudicious, and unsafe for the United States to go into a proposition of this kind and pay two million and a half dollars for a dormitory that is to accommodate 350 students. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to it. The gentleman speaks of the magnificent work done by the Navy.

He knows as well as I do that if these boys had come out of two and a half million dollar buildings, with all the extravagance which that means, that this work would not have been done; but it has been done by boys out of farmhouses and out of merchants' houses. They have gone there, and their work has been study and study; and the result came to us in the war of the rebellion and in the Spanish war.

But you put a boy to study in such a structure as that, and accustom the cadets of the United States to such sort of surroundings, and you cultivate a habit of living which, in my opinion, will prove very detrimental to the Navy in years to come. I hope that all the money that is needed to give comfortable and pleasant surroundings to the cadets may be furnished, but in my judgment the construction of a two million and a half structure for 350 cadets at Annapolis will prove fatal to the efficiency of the Navy in the future.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statements and criticisms upon the Naval Committee made by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, I desire to say very reluctantly a few words in regard to this matter, and especially in defense of the committee. I want to call the attention of this House to the fact that if we are in a difficulty in regard to this Naval Academy matter this House is solely and wholly responsible for it. When the last naval appropriation bill was considered, by reference to the RECORD you will see that certain gentlemen, including the chairman of the committee, myself, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD], whom I see before me, and who was then a member of the committee, earnestly urged Congress not to embark upon this work until it was ready and until the plans had been adopted in their entirety.

The simple fact that confronts you now is this: That you overruled the committee's ideas, and you started upon a complete rehabilitation of the Naval Academy and its grounds according to plans that will take, in my humble judgment, as it is admitted in some hearings, eleven millions and may take eventually $15,000,000. But you are in this dilemma: You have already provided for two buildings according to this plan—this extraordinary and excessive plan that this House determined and embarked upon in the last Congress. Now, you can not carry out this plan unless you carry this appropriation through.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Are those buildings already contracted for and in progress of construction?

Mr. DAYTON. These buildings on which Congress overruled the committee in the last Congress have already been contracted for and are under construction and the money appropriated. You will have a magnificent armory, a magnificent boathouse, in granite, that will be things of beauty; and if you cut down this appropriation, as proposed, you will have a cadet quarters that will be in no comparison, and will be a thing to be ashamed of, made out of brick.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The armory is being built out of granite?

Mr. DAYTON. The armory is now being built out of granite, according to this plan that was furnished by a private architect, without any authority on the part of Congress or anybody else, and which this House headlong adopted in the last Congress against the protest of this committee and the members upon the committee.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Who pays for this plan?

Mr. DAYTON. The architect will get 5 per cent, and in my judgment his bill will amount to five or six hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. LACEY. And the more expensive the building the better it will be for the architect?

Mr. DAYTON. And the more expended the more the architect will get out of it.

Mr. LACEY. And the architect's fees will exceed the ordinary endowment of many of the colleges that graduate more than they do at Annapolis?

Mr. DAYTON. I am simply stating the facts, and I am doing it in defense of the committee. That which the committee is doing is nothing more nor less than following your instructions, given in the strongest possible way, given in the last session, when you overruled the committee, when we thought that the matter ought to be presented in a businesslike way by plan.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Did Congress contract for the construction of these buildings?

Mr. DAYTON. Congress picked out two buildings and gave the appropriation necessary to build them, increased the cost of them, and provided that they should be of granite, and not of brick. You can not possibly carry out that plan without appropriating the sums that are called for, and in the amounts called for.

Mr. MUDD. I will ask my colleague if he favors the committee report or is against it?

Mr. DAYTON. I have stood by in the hearings in the committee room, and I have sought to solve this proposition and this trouble. It has been beyond my ability to do so. Congress, which is supreme, has embarked upon this plan which we have adopted, and I stand by the action of the committee, and will vote for it with the explanation I have made. I do not see what else you can do, but I do not want to be charged with extravagance in allowing an extravagant appropriation to go through without explaining to the House that the House is responsible for it and nobody else.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend allow me right there? My friend says, if I understand him, that we have already appropriated $1,200,000 to build an armory and a boathouse.

Mr. MUDD. A power house.

Mr. CANNON. One million two hundred thousand dollars to build two or three houses and that that contract has been made within that limitation.

Mr. DAYTON. Yes; and according to this plan.

Mr. CANNON. And if we work out this plan and get all of it to suit the boathouse and the armory, that it will cost, as the hearing says, eleven millions, and, as my friend says, possibly fifteen millions.

Mr. DAYTON. I do. It shows that it is eight million and some dollars without the purchase of additional ground required, and that runs it up to eleven millions, but these estimates are not accurate.

Mr. CANNON. Now, these estimates were made when prices were at low tide.

Mr. DAYTON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Since that time there has been an appreciation in material and prices from 33 to 50 per cent, so the estimates ought to be, at present prices, from eleven to twelve million dollars. Now, I want to ask my friend if he does not think it wise to let the other buildings not correspond with the granite boathouse and the armory? Or if it is absolutely necessary that they should, let us authorize them to tear down the $1,200,000 worth and make new plans within the six-million limit, rather than go on to the fifteen millions. [Applause.]

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the gentleman as best I may. I have learned to regard the will of Congress as supreme. This matter was all explained as earnestly and as fully as we possibly could explain it last year, and your committee fought against it. They thought, and I stated then, as I state now, that there was not a man on the floor who more honestly desired to see a reasonable establishment made there at Annapolis than myself, but the whole matter was explained, the plans were brought in here, and the whole thing was shown to the House of Representatives, and you adopted that plan; and that is the reason why we have reported this additional building in accordance with it. I do not see how you can stop now without retracting what you did two years ago.

Mr. HILL. Have these other buildings been built?

Mr. DAYTON. They are under contract.

Mr. HILL. Is there a single block of granite laid there?

Mr. DAYTON. Oh, yes.

Mr. HILL. There is nothing but the foundation.

Mr. MUDD. I would like to read from the hearing before the Committee on Naval Affairs, from the testimony of Mr. Flagg, the architect, in order to show that the statement I have made is correct and that all statements undertaking to show that the reconstruction of this Academy will cost from ten to sixteen millions of dollars, or anything like such a sum, are absolutely false and a bold misrepresentation of the facts:

Mr. DAYTON. Your estimate was for the grounds, building the sea wall, dredging the basin, and the tearing down of all these quarters, and you estimated it would be $10,000,000?

Mr. FLAGG. That is a rough estimate. I made as careful an estimate as I could, and it was $6,000,000, and the granite $2,000,000; and if you allow for the rise in the price of material, it would be $1,000,000 more. That would be for everything.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to know whether that includes the foundation, and does it include the grounds as well as removing the old buildings?

Mr. FLAGG. It is everything.

That accords entirely with my statement. It was $6,000,000 originally, as estimated by the "Matthews board," to which I have referred. If you construct all of the buildings, which Congress need not do, and construct them all of granite, which Congress may or may not do, as it sees fit, it would be $8,000,000.

If the enhanced price of materials, as I have above stated, is to continue, it would be one million more, making nine millions in all, providing we construct the cadets' quarters on the original estimate of $3,536,000, which Mr. Flagg, in his estimate and in his statement above, had in view and contemplated. But we have already reduced this estimate $1,036,000, bringing the whole matter, even if, I repeat, we construct all the buildings of granite, still within the estimate of $8,000,000.

In conclusion, I want to say that if my friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON], a member of this committee, who, in response to my question, declared himself to be one of the friends of this institution—if he is to be considered its friend after his speech and his statements, then, I say, God save us from our friends!

Mr. DAYTON. I am a friend of the institution, but at the same time I want to discharge my duty to this House and to the country. I want to say that in the hearings there are other estimates which anybody can refer to if he desires that will sustain my proposition.

Mr. MUDD. In response to a hostile cross-examination you can get out almost anything you desire.

Now, if I may be indulged a moment further, I wish to say that the architect's fees as included in these estimates are regulated by the American Institute of Architects. So far as he has gone (and there has been no contract made with him for anything further) he gets exactly what architects employed under the authority of the Treasury Department get—what is given to the architect of the New York custom-house and the Baltimore custom-house and public buildings put up in different parts of this country, the same fees also that are paid for private work—exactly what architects get all over the country.

The gentleman from West Virginia knows this to be the fact. The architect offered to exhibit books which would show satisfactorily to members of this House, as has been shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, that after the payment of employees and other expenses the fees of the architect would amount to only $1.36 per cent. All I want is that the facts of this case be shown to the House, and I think it will then be seen that the committee in reporting this provision has acted wisely and in exact accord with what is the custom with reference to similar fees for buildings constructed under the Treasury Department and other Departments of the Government that may be intrusted with the construction of Government buildings.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be considered an enemy of this institution simply because I object to the expenditure of ten or fifteen million dollars for its rehabilitation. I have no criticism to make of the committee. We stood here last year and opposed what we knew would commit Congress, or practically commit it, to a scheme which we thought ought not to prevail.

A few years ago a Board of Visitors was appointed to visit the Annapolis Academy. The result of a recommendation of that Board of Visitors was the appointment of what is known as the Matthews board. That board employed an architect, as I recollect, to devise plans for the reconstruction of this institution; and he evolved a magnificent scheme for that purpose. It provided for the making of new grounds and the purchase of additional grounds. It provided for an armory here, and a boathouse there, with a magnificent structure in the center, and other buildings located elsewhere.

As we believed then and believe now, the total cost of carrying out the scheme proposed would not be less than $10,000,000, and might amount to $15,000,000. Nobody can tell what the total cost will be when this scheme is finally consummated. Why, sir, the architect's fee—I admit it is the usual architect's fee; nobody is complaining of the architect who may put up this building—but the architect's fee alone will be more than the endowment of a good many colleges in this country that turn out annually double the number of students that are turned out at Annapolis.

When the appropriations were proposed for the building we pointed out to this House that these buildings to be provided for were buildings which would be located and built according to the plan proposed by the Matthews board and would involve this enormous expenditure of money. Why, sir, under this plan the education of every cadet turned out from the Annapolis Academy will cost twenty or thirty thousand dollars or more.

I have not the slightest doubt that such will be the cost if this expenditure is made, to say nothing of the expenditure of a couple of hundred thousand dollars to be appropriated annually to maintain this institution. Taking the interest upon the amount of money proposed to be invested in these improvements, I venture to repeat the statement that the education of every cadet turned out from the Annapolis Academy would cost $20,000.

These things were all stated to Congress two years ago. Unhappily, there were very few members present when this matter was discussed, but it was gone into fully. It was pointed out what we were doing; that we were entering upon a scheme which would involve this Government to the extent pointed out to-day.

I say it is better that we should retrace our steps here and now, or begin to do so, than attempt to carry out this extravagant scheme, which is attempted to be foisted upon Congress in the way I have endeavored briefly to indicate.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the House more than a few minutes in stating my views upon the proposition which this Committee of the Whole is now considering.

I have listened with a great deal of interested attention to this discussion on both sides; and to my mind the controversy seems to have resolved itself into this question: Whether the United States Government shall return to the pristine "simplicity of the fathers," which has been expatiated upon so eloquently by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], or whether this nation, the greatest on the earth, entered now upon a career of world power, shall build almost beneath the shadow of this magnificent building, the Capitol of the United States, a sufficient and decent home for the future officers of the Navy of the United States.

If we are to be governed in this matter by considerations of absolute necessity and the most rigid economy, I agree with the gentleman from Nevada, and say, tear down the old buildings which now disgrace the campus at Annapolis and house the boys in little dog tents. Let them get down to the "simplicity" of Valley Forge.

But, sir, if this Congress is to authorize appropriations to comport with the dignity of this nation's power, then it seems to me there can not be a question as to what is the proper course to be pursued upon the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois. It is quite true that, if necessity alone be considered, $50,000, $75,000, or $100,000 may be all that are needed. It is quite true that you may go even lower than that and provide no barracks and no sufficient comfort or sanitary protection for the future officers of the Navy.

Mr. Chairman, this Government has not been influenced by that penny-wise pound-foolish policy in the construction of any of its public buildings. It will not be denied that the operations of the War Department could be successfully and properly conducted in a building of much less pretensions than the magnificent piece of architecture which graces the southern side of the avenue in this city.

It will not be contended that the wisdom of representatives of the United States Government, both in this end and the other end of this Capitol, could fail to find proper expression in much humbler quarters than we now occupy. If necessity and economy are to be the guide of our conduct, then, sir, apply them not only to the home of the boys who are to protect the flag on the high seas against the attack of other nations, but apply them everywhere. We construct magnificent steamships. We arrange the officers' quarters with an eye not only to their comfort, but the luxurious entertainment of the occupant.

I have never heard it said, sir, that the prowess and courage, the audacious valor of the officers of the United States Navy have been affected by the luxury of their staterooms, and I should hesitate to believe that the capacity, fidelity, and efficiency of an officer of the United States Navy should be in any wise controlled by his environment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to close the debate in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, this undertaking is not an undertaking of the Committee on Naval Affairs. The Committee on Naval Affairs came here with a proposition that the whole matter should be submitted to five of the leading architects of the country, without specifying the five.

The proposal to rebuild the Naval Academy has been before the Naval Committee ever since I have been a member of the committee, and that is over ten years. The House of Representatives in the year that the Spanish war began turned the Naval Committee down and took the matter into its own hands. It was understood that a beginning for the reconstruction of the Naval Academy was to be made under the appropriations made at that session. It was understood that the plans and everything else should be left to John D. Long, Secretary of the Navy, and the debate at that time, if you will refer to it, will prove it.

Now, in the last Congress we made another addition to the appropriation, and the work is being carried on in accordance with the plans and specifications selected by the Secretary of the Navy. The main argument for the beginning of the work was the condition of the cadets' quarters. They were in buildings condemned eight years ago. You have been spending thousands and thousands of dollars upon them to make them healthy and safe, and they are as unhealthy to-day and in as tumble-down a condition as they were when you made the first appropriation. Now that the committee have carried out the wishes of the House and have themselves cut down over a million of dollars the estimates sent to them by the Navy Department, you propose to destroy the whole plan and to erect some kind of a horse shed—at least, a building entirely out of proportion to the other buildings—and to turn down this appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, this appropriation was not made alone for quarters for the cadets. The library is to be removed there. The museum is to be stationed there. It is to be a historical building. It is to be a building calculated to stand the storms of a thousand years. We have in the Naval Committee cut down the original plans for that building, taking $500,000 off the estimates. The original plan provided for a wing on each end of the building. We have agreed to discard them. The building is to be constructed in accordance with the general plans; and if you reduce the appropriation, you will have a granite boathouse, a brick building for the cadets, a slab building for something else, and all sorts of buildings, like Joseph's coat of many colors, on exhibition as the great American Naval Academy, for the inspection of the nations of the world. I submit that common sense requires that we should give the appropriation which the unwilling Naval Committee has allowed, in accord with the dictum of the last House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I desire to withdraw that amendment and to offer the following——

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman can withdraw his amendment and substitute another.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I shall object to the withdrawal of the original amendment.

Mr. MUDD. I want to hear it read before I consent, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. CANNON. Then I offer this amendment as a substitute for the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers the following as a substitute for the section.

Mr. CANNON. As a substitute for the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 33, in line 24, strike out the word "for" and insert the word "toward;" and on page 34 strike out all after the word "quarters," in line 1, down to and including line 5, and insert:

"Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars: Provided, That before any part of this sum is expended plans shall be prepared and approved by the Secretary of the Navy, covering all contemplated new buildings and improvements at the Naval Academy, which plans shall not involve a total expenditure of more than $6,000,000, including the sum of one million two and twenty thousand dollars heretofore appropriated, and the sum herein appropriated for said buildings and improvements."

Mr. MUDD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call attention to the fact that this is not a substitute for the paragraph, but an amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. It is hastily drawn, and I will withdraw the former amendment and offer this as an amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I object to the withdrawal of the former amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It requires unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MAHON. Vote it down.

Mr. KITCHIN. A parliamentary inquiry. After it has been agreed by the committee, as I understand, that debate upon that section and all amendments should be closed at the end of five minutes, the five minutes having passed, would it be in order then to substitute another amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly; that motion only closes debate.

Mr. MUDD. A parliamentary inquiry. Were there not two amendments already pending? Did not the gentleman from Illinois offer to modify his first proposition?

Mr. CANNON. I did modify it.

The CHAIRMAN. He did modify his first proposition.

Mr. MUDD. The gentleman offered the first amendment, limiting the cost of the whole construction to $6,000,000, and he offered a subsequent one, a modification of that, referring to the cadets' quarters.

Mr. WACHTER. No; he suggested that he would do that.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if I may have unanimous consent——

Mr. MUDD. Not for debate.

Mr. CANNON. Not for debate, but simply to explain the amendment.

Mr. MUDD. I think we ought to vote.

Mr. CANNON. Very well, I will withdraw my amendment and offer this amendment in the place of it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I object to his withdrawing it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois refer to his first amendment?

Mr. CANNON. Then I will treat this last amendment as a substitute for the first, if I can get at it.

The CHAIRMAN. The difficulty is that the gentleman first offered an amendment to the text of the paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then he offered an amendment to that amendment, adding certain words to the paragraph as well as amending the text of the paragraph, so that there are two amendments now pending, and nothing is in order except a substitute for the entire paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. I intended the two to be one. I modified my first amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It was not so stated to the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Then there is an amendment to the amendment. Now, a substitute for the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. No, a substitute for the paragraph is in order.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McRAE. If we vote down the first amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, will not the other one be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will ask that it be voted down.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Would it be in order to offer that as a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. It would be in order to offer it as a substitute for the whole paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will offer it as a substitute for the whole paragraph. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad for the gentleman to put it in form so that the Clerk can report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as substitute for the paragraph in line 24, page 33, and in line 5, page 34, the following:

"Buildings and grounds, Naval Academy: Toward the construction at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., of a building suitable for use as cadets' quarters, $350,000: Provided, That before any part of this sum is expended plans shall be prepared and approved by the Secretary of the Navy covering all contemplated new buildings and improvements at the Naval Academy, which plans shall involve a total expenditure of not more than $6,000,000, including the sum of $1,200,000 heretofore appropriated and the sum herein appropriated for said buildings and improvements."

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I would like the Clerk to read the contents of the paper which he has in his hand. I think the Clerk is reading something from the bill and something that the gentleman has sent to the desk.

Mr. DALZELL. He has a right to do that.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. He has not a right to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that an amendment may be stated verbally by a member or read from the Clerk's desk or stated by the Chair. If it is not in accordance with the understanding of the gentleman from Illinois, of course it will be for him to say so.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. But the Clerk is reading a part of the paragraph and a part of an amendment sent up as substitute, and I submit that that is not proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is proper. Now, the question is upon perfecting the original paragraph, and of course it will come on the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, and the amendment to that amendment offered by himself.

Mr. CANNON. I want that amendment that I offered voted down; and I will ask the committee, if such is its will, to adopt the substitute after the other amendments are voted down.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the original amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask to have that read.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois and read by the Clerk.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask that the substitute be reported again. There have been so many amendments offered that we do not know what we are called to vote on.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the substitute will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a substitute for the paragraph beginning line 24, page 33, and in line 5, page 34, the following:

"Buildings and grounds, Naval Academy: Toward the construction at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., of a suitable building for use as cadet quarters, $350,000: Provided, That before any part of this sum is expended plans shall be prepared and approved by the Secretary of the Navy covering all contemplated new buildings and improvements at the Naval Academy, which plans shall involve a total expenditure of not more than $6,000,000, including the sum of $1,200,000 heretofore appropriated and the sum herein appropriated for said buildings and improvements."

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MUDD. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 44.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MUDD. I give notice that I will ask for a yea-and-nay vote in the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, furthermore, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to remove or tear down all buildings at the Naval Academy that interfere with the improvements and rebuilding of that institution.

Mr. CANNON. I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois that he move that the committee now rise. I want to examine, as well as some other members, the remaining paragraph there. I believe, in view of the action of the House, they ought to be stricken out. It is now a quarter past 5 o'clock, and I appeal to the gentleman that he move that the committee rise.

Mr. FOSS. I have no objection, Mr. Chairman, and I move that the committee rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10450 and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. R. 115. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to cause bronze medals to be struck and distributed to certain officers and men who participated in the war with Spain, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6959. An act to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act granting increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases," approved January 5, 1893; and

H. R. 4001. An act authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on the Navajo Indian Reservation, Territory of Arizona.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. R. 114. Joint resolution for the relief of Garfield Hospital; and

S. 2942. An act granting an increase of pension to William Padgett.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LANE, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. HAUGEN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, for five days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. ALEXANDER, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of N. Ward Cady, Fifty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CONCORD AND LEXINGTON.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, to-day is the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the battle of Concord and Lexington. The State of Massachusetts celebrates this day a public holiday, and I think it is proper that this House should not adjourn until the resolution which I have sent to the Clerk's desk may be read and its contents made part of the official proceedings of this day.

Washington is noted for its monuments to the statesmen and patriots of this country. The public squares of the city will continue to be adorned year after year with the products of the sculptor's art, commemorating the deeds of some of America's greatest sons. What worthier subject to call out the skill and excellence of one of our great sculptors than the story of the embattled farmer, who on the field of Lexington and Concord, on the 19th of April, 1775, fired the shot which was heard around the world. These were the first American patriots, and here in the nation's capital, the seat of government of this great Republic, it seems to me fitting that a monument of New England granite should be reared that the present and future generations may be greeted with concrete evidence of the love and admiration that the nation bears these heroes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be read, after which it will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000 to erect a monument in one of the public squares of Washington to commemorate the virtues and the bravery of the embattled farmer whose shot, fired in the field of Concord and Lexington one hundred and twenty-five years ago to-day, heard around the world, blazed the way for American freedom and made possible the independence of the thirteen States.

THE TWELFTH CENSUS.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I have been directed by the Committee on the Census to report back House bill 10696, with a favorable recommendation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10696) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the case of the schooner Orange, John Holman, master, against the United States—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the case of the schooner Little Will, William Tallman, master, against the United States—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Thomas S. Thrasher, administrator of the estate of Robert K. Thrasher, against the United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 20, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

VESSEL SLOOP ALMENA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the annexed findings by the court relating to the vessel sloop Almena, John Smith, master; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

VESSEL SCHOONER ADAMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the annexed findings by the court relating to the vessel schooner Adams, Stephen Brown, master; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. H. L. OVERSTREET, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, and 8 to the bill (H. R. 10449) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes; agrees to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3 and 4, each with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 3436) granting a pension to Caroline Weinhimer.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

A bill (S. 2942) granting an increase of pension to William Padgett;

A bill (H. R. 4001) authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on the Navajo Indian Reservation, Territory of Arizona;

A bill (H. R. 6959) to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act granting increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases," approved January, 1893;

A joint resolution (S. R. 114) for relief of Garfield Hospital; and

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 235) authorizing the exhibit of Government relics at the New York Printing Exposition from May 2 to June 2, 1900.

ALLOWANCE OF EXCEPTIONS.

Mr. HOAR. Before the morning business, I ask unanimous consent to correct an omission I made yesterday. When the bill (H. R. 8366) to amend section 953 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the allowance of exceptions, was passed, I stated that it was my purpose to ask for a conference. I forgot after the bill had passed to make the request. The bill has not gone to the House; the Secretary has retained it; and I now move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HOAR, Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, and Mr. BACON were appointed.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2019) reorganizing the Naval Observatory and providing for a board of visitors, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

APPEALS IN PENSION CASES.

Mr. GALLINGER. From the Committee on Pensions I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 4251) providing for the adjudication by the Court of Claims and Supreme Court of pension claims involving difficult or important questions of law as a means of establishing judicial precedents for the guidance of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions, and I submit a report thereon.

Mr. President, I desire to say that this is a bill which, in my judgment, solves the problem to a very considerable extent of pension adjudication. It was drafted by the Secretary of the Interior, and it provides that the Secretary of the Interior may submit to the Court of Claims during any one calendar year not exceeding five pension claims that relate to a class that involve difficult or important questions of law. It proposes to enact further that an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, and the necessary machinery is provided.

I should like very much to have the bill passed, as I am to be absent from the city for a week, and I venture to ask unanimous consent that it be put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read in full to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire to explain the scope of this proposed legislation. If I got the drift of it in the reading I listened to, it is a provision by which the Government provides for the suit of the Government by itself, and it takes from the Commissioner of Pensions the adjudication of questions of law which have hitherto been decided by him alone. Am I correct?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I did briefly explain the scope of this proposed legislation. The bill I will say was drafted by the Secretary of the Interior.

Ever since I have been in public life we have been endeavoring to meet the demand, the agitation, of the soldiers that they should have some way of appealing their cases from the Commissioner of Pensions. I have myself introduced two bills creating a court of appeals; but when I came to look the matter over I saw that it was not practicable to have a court of that kind, for the reason that every rejected claim would be sent to the court, and the court would soon be burdened with thousands and thousands of cases which could not be attended to.

Now, this bill simply provides that the Secretary of the Interior may, during any one calendar year, select five claims—claims that belong to a class or that involve difficult or important questions of law—and he may submit them to the Court of Claims for trial and adjudication. The finding of the Court of Claims may be appealed by either side to the Supreme Court of the United States. I have believed it to be a very important and desirable piece of legislation. I may be wrong about it, but that is my judgment. There are to-day hundreds of cases belonging to classes held up in the Pension Bureau, and the Senator, I think——

Mr. TILLMAN. Right there, is it not true that those cases are not pensionable under existing laws, and the reason why they are held up is because the Commissioner of Pensions and those under him who have decided the question of law at issue have determined that those cases are exceptions, and that therefore the applicants were not pensionable?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; not at all. The question is whether or not they are pensionable——

Mr. TILLMAN. I say——

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the very question involved.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Commissioner has decided that they are not; otherwise he would have given them the pension.

Mr. GALLINGER. He has not so decided. He simply has suspended those cases, and they are now pending in the Bureau. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] will, I am sure, confirm what I say.

Mr. COCKRELL. In one class of cases there are a hundred pending on appeal. The appeals have been pending before the Secretary for, I suppose, six months. Here are minors applying for pensions for the time during which they were under 16 years of age, and they were 16 years of age at the time they made their application. It is a question of legal construction as to whether they are entitled to apply after they have become 16 years of age for the pension that was due them while they were under 16 years of age. It is a knotty legal question, and I know I have at least a dozen letters from the Secretary of the Interior or the Assistant Secretary and the Commissioner of Pensions stating that that question of law is pending before the Secretary on appeal.

Now, I think that some provision like this, where a few cases of certain classes could be taken to the court and a decision rendered, would in all probability save a construction by one Commissioner of Pensions and reversing it by his successor, where it is a close question as to what the law is. I think it would be in the interest of the pensioners and in the interest of uniformity of action to have another tribunal where these knotty questions could be settled.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I move to strike out of the——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not yet before the Senate, if the Senator pleases. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. I object.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if this bill has been considered by the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been, and I was authorized——

Mr. TILLMAN. And it is reported from that committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Minnesota to object?

Mr. DAVIS. I object.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McLAURIN introduced a bill (S. 4281) for the relief of T. B. Stackhouse; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 4282) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4283) authorizing P. A. Surg. William C. Braisted, United States Navy, and Luther C. Ellsworth, United States consul at Puerto Cabello, to accept decorations and orders tendered to them by the Government of Venezuela; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4284) to authorize Capt. N. M. Brooks, Superintendent of Foreign Mails, Post-Office Department, to accept a decoration tendered to him by the Emperor of Germany; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 4285) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Cape Girardeau, Mo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 4286) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to issue medals of honor to 60 surviving members of the Worth Infantry and York Rifles, of Pennsylvania; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4287) granting an increase of pension to Richard P. Nishuals; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4288) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Brooks; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (S. 4289) for the relief of Hatcher and Hiram Short; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 4290) to provide for the acquirement by the United States of lands and rights therein necessary to the establishment of a naval station in Pearl Harbor, island of Oahu, Hawaii, and for the dredging of approaches to said harbor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,750 for repairs and improvements to buildings used by the legation of the United States at Seoul, Korea, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 for expenses of delegation of the United States to the proposed international conference of American states, to be held in the City of Mexico, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate the sum of $1,000 to be expended by the Joint Committee on the Library for the purchase of the Ingalls portraits in oil of the late Senators Allen G. Thurman and Simon Cameron, now owned by Dr. E. A. Duncan, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY OFFICERS IN CUBA AND PORTO RICO.

Mr. BACON. I offer a resolution which I ask may be read and have present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to report to the Senate the following information:

First. Whether any officer of the Army of the United States who is now, or who has been, on duty either in Cuba or Porto Rico since the date of the declaration of war by the United States against Spain has received any compensation for any service of any kind whatsoever other than the compensation to which such officer of the Army is, as such, entitled by law to receive as his salary and allowances.

Second. If any officer of the United States Army has during said period, while on duty in either Cuba or Porto Rico, received from any source any compensation other than that which he is, as such officer, entitled by law to receive as his salary and allowances, what is the name and rank of each such officer, and what the amount or amounts received by him, the date or dates on which each of said amounts was so received, on what account the said amount or amounts were paid, by whom said payment or payments were authorized, and out of what fund or funds said payments were made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SEWELL. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. BACON. I offer another resolution of kindred character, which I ask may be read and that it may have present consideration. I will state, however, in making this request, that I have no objection, if the Senator from New Jersey desires that it shall be laid over, to have it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to report to the Senate the following information:

First. Whether any officer of the Army of the United States who is now, or who has been, on duty either in Cuba or Porto Rico since the date of the declaration of war by the United States against Spain has had furnished to him by any person or authority any quarters other than such quarters as such officer is entitled under the law to receive. If so, what is the name and rank of each officer so furnished with such quarters and what quarters in each such instance have been so furnished.

Second. What rent has been paid in each instance for quarters thus furnished to officers of the Army during said period either in Cuba or in Porto Rico.

Third. What amounts have been expended in each instance in repairing, refitting, or improving any quarters occupied by any officer of the United States Army on duty in Cuba or Porto Rico during said period, and for which officer in each instance was such quarters thus repaired, refitted, and improved.

Fourth. What amounts have been expended in each instance in furnishing or decorating any quarters occupied by any officer of the United States Army in Cuba or Porto Rico during said period, what was the character of such furnishings and decorations, and for which officer, in each instance, were the quarters thus furnished and decorated.

Fifth. What amounts have been expended for horses or mules, harness, vehicles or equipages of any kind to be used by any officer of the United States Army on duty in Cuba or Porto Rico during said period, and for which officer, in each instance, were the horses, mules, harness, vehicles, or other equipages furnished.

Sixth. What amounts have been paid for the hire of servants, or as compensation for services rendered in and about the quarters of any officer of the United States Army during said period in Cuba or Porto Rico, and in each instance who was the officer occupying said quarters in and about which said servants were employed or said services were rendered.

Seventh. What amounts have been paid for supplies of any kind furnished to any officer of the United States Army during said period in Cuba or Porto Rico other than the allowances to which such officer is entitled under the law, and in each instance who is the officer thus receiving such supplies.

Eighth. In each of the expenditures concerning which inquiry is made, out of what fund was said amount paid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SEWELL. I do not know what——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SEWELL. Allow me to interrogate the Senator from Georgia for a moment. I do not object.

Mr. BACON. I can not hear the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SEWELL. I do not object. I wish merely to say that it is well known, of course, that our officers, particularly our commanding officers in Cuba and Porto Rico, took possession, naturally, of the palaces that their predecessors had occupied, and it may be that they have had allowances, but everything of that kind has come from the insular receipts. I do not object to the inquiry.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

Mr. BACON. I beg the Chair's pardon; I desire to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to say with reference to the other resolution that I do not understand why one should go over and the other not. Still I have no objection to any direction the Senator from New Jersey may desire to give in that regard.

I wish to say, although the first resolution is not to be now acted upon, that that resolution, with reference to the pay of officers, was introduced by me not as an original motion on my part, but in response to the suggestion and invitation and, I might say, the challenge of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

I do not desire to be understood in any inquiry made in either one of these resolutions as making any assertion that I have information of a definite character that the things inquired about exist or have occurred. On the contrary, as I said yesterday concerning the pay of officers, I have no information except that which is general to the public, and about the correctness of which I have no certainty whatever.

Since the first resolution with reference to the pay of officers was drafted I have had assurances, which I deem to be entitled to full credit, that there has been no such extra pay received by any officer in Porto Rico, and, as I said on yesterday, I am very glad to know that such is the fact, and I would be equally glad if the answer of the Secretary of War shall show that there has been nothing of the kind in Cuba.

Nothing is further from my intention than in any manner to reflect upon any officer of the Army, and no member of the Senate would be more gratified than I if I find that the law, as I understand it to have been stated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] yesterday, has been strictly followed and observed.

Now, Mr. President, with reference to the second resolution, which makes a certain inquiry as to what amounts have been expended for the accommodation, and enjoyment, if you please, of officers of the Army in Cuba and Porto Rico, I will state my reason for introducing it. In that case, as in the other, I do not wish to be understood as making any charge that there have been these expenditures. I wish to disclaim any definite knowledge upon that subject. But I think it is due to the officers of the Army that this information should be given to the Senate from an authoritative source. There are very prejudicial rumors and statements being made with reference to these expenditures. I repeat, I do not know whether they are correct or not. I have no doubt many of them are largely exaggerated; but it is being repeated throughout the community with the utmost confidence that there has been the most lavish expenditure in Cuba in the way of the fitting up of quarters, in the providing of equipages and the decorating of quarters, and in providing not only the comforts but the luxuries of quarters, and that, as has been stated in my hearing, there has been an expenditure which has absolutely surpassed anything which has ever been expended by any one of the Spanish governors when there in a viceregal position.

I hope, Mr. President, that none of this is true. If it is true, however, it should be known in order that the corrective may be applied. If it is not true, it is due to the officers about whom these statements are being made that there should be an authoritative denial of them.

I thought it due to myself, Mr. President, that I should make this statement, and I will make the further statement that while this matter has been upon my mind for some time, I have refrained from introducing any resolution of inquiry, and I would not have done so now but for the invitation of the Senator from New Hampshire. It is true the inquiry in the second resolution is one which was not suggested by him, but it is one which is cognate with it, and if one piece of information is to be given the other ought also to be given.

While these matters have been talked about, I have felt that if the inquiry were presented by one from this side of the Chamber it might possibly present something in the nature of a partisan proceeding, and I preferred that the resolutions of inquiry should come from the other side of the Chamber. I repeat that I now offer these resolutions simply because on yesterday, as the outcome of a short colloquy which we were having, there was a distinct invitation and challenge on the part of the Senator from New Hampshire that this inquiry should be made through a resolution to be introduced by myself.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I intended no challenge. My suggestion to the Senator was in good faith.

Mr. BACON. I so understand it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think if he had not offered the first resolution I should have offered it myself. I preferred, however, that the Senator should draw them, because I knew he would draw them more concisely, more briefly, than I would be likely to do.

Now, Mr. President, as the first resolution is going over upon the objection of the Senator from New Jersey, I will object to to the consideration of the second resolution, the language of which I wish to examine. But I have no doubt that to-morrow I shall be in favor of the passage of both the resolutions. I beg to assure the Senator that I had no intention of challenging him. I said I did not believe that any Army officer had received any money as compensation for his services outside the pay allowed by law. I believe that now. If the fact is otherwise, I shall be glad to be informed of it.

As to the fitting up and the decoration of quarters I have no knowledge whatever; but the resolution is an extremely proper one. I am very glad the Senator has introduced it, and I certainly acquit him of being, at this time and in this thing, possessed by any intense partisan feeling.

Mr. BACON. I am very much obliged to the Senator, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10449) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes, numbered 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, and 8, and agreeing to amendments numbered 3 and 4 with amendments as follows:

At the end of each amendment insert:

, except in so far as such printing may be necessary in executing the requirements of the act "To define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes," approved March 14, 1900.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3 and 4. If the motion prevails, it will pass the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the assistant clerk to the Committee on the Judiciary be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,800 per annum, until otherwise provided by law.

WAR-REVENUE RECEIPTS.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 9824.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a resolution on the table coming over that I should like to have laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota will suspend one moment while the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted on the 18th instant by Mr. GALLINGER, as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to communicate to the Senate, at the earliest practicable day, a statement showing the aggregate amount of revenue, since the war-revenue law went into operation, derived from stamps on notes, bank checks, insurance policies, deeds, leases, mortgages, telegrams, express shipments, successions of estates, and medicinal preparations, and beer, each item to be stated separately.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer a substitute for that resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to communicate to the Senate, at the earliest practicable day, a statement showing the amount of revenue derived from the so-called war-revenue law, the items to be stated separately, so far as it is practicable to do so, in regard to each subject of taxation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator withdraws his original resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. I withdraw the original resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered as a substitute.

The resolution was agreed to.

FLOATING LOOSE TIMBER, RAFTS, ETC., ON CERTAIN RIVERS.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 9824) authorizing the Secretary of War to make regulations governing the running of loose logs, steamboats, and rafts on certain rivers and streams.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator will delay taking action upon that bill until I can submit a conference report.

Mr. NELSON. This will take but a few minutes.

Mr. CULLOM. It seems to be a pretty long bill.

Mr. NELSON. No, it is not long. There is a substitute reported.

Mr. COCKRELL. When was the bill reported?

Mr. NELSON. Yesterday, from the Committee on Commerce. The bill was recommended by the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the substitute reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. Let the first part of the bill be read again.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say to the Senator from Maine——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks for the reading of the first section of the amendment.

Mr. HALE. The first one or two sections.

The Secretary read as requested.

Mr. HALE. I have heard enough to justify me in objecting to the consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine objects.

TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

Mr. WARREN. I ask leave to call up Senate bill 2610.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. TURLEY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I made a conference report the day before yesterday, which was withdrawn. I now present it again, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois presents a conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, which has heretofore been read to the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, it seems to me that this report ought to be rejected and sent back to the conference committee, and for this reason: On page 27 of the bill, paragraph 5, under "Qualifications of voters for representatives," occurs this provision:

Prior to such registration have paid, on or before the 31st day of March next preceding the date of registration, all taxes due by him to the government.

This provision practically disfranchises most of the people who are citizens of the United States and citizens of Hawaii, for the reason that the Hawaiian government imposes a poll tax of $5 upon every voter—that is, they impose a tax of $1, which they call a poll tax; $2 as a road tax, and $2 as a school tax; making a poll tax, in all, of $5. This provision is that every person must have paid this tax before the 31st day of March next preceding the date of registration.

There were only 2,600 voters in Hawaii according to the last election, and this provides that those who wish to vote at the next election for members of the legislature shall have paid their tax previous to the 31st day of last March. Of course, that is previous to the passage of this bill, and it therefore disfranchises everybody who has not paid this five-dollar tax.

The people of Hawaii——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator be kind enough to read that again? I did not hear it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will complete my remarks, and in the meantime the Senator can look at the provision in the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to understand what the Senator is stating; that is all.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The provision is that—

Prior to such registration have paid, on or before the 31st day of March next preceding the date of registration, all taxes due by him to the government.

He must have paid this poll tax of $5 before the 31st day of last March or he is disfranchised from voting for members of the next legislature. The next legislature will have the power to impose a tax of $15 if they choose, or a tax of any other sum, and thus forever exclude nearly all the voters of that country from participation in the government.

It is no defense to say that this was a provision in the bill as it passed the Senate; for the bill as it came from the Committee on Foreign Relations contained so many iniquities that the Senate overlooked this one, and it is not strange that they did overlook it, because no one told us that the tax law of Hawaii imposes a poll tax of $5 per capita. It was simply overlooked. The House amended this provision by providing for the payment of "a poll tax of $1 for the current year due by him to the government."

That left the voter a chance to qualify under this bill; but the Senate conferees, it appears, have insisted upon the Senate provision, and insisted, therefore, upon disfranchising everybody but the sugar planters of Hawaii and their employees.

Who owns the wealth of Hawaii? The men who have received the $80,000,000 bonus paid to the sugar raisers of that country by the people of the United States. Who can pay the taxes? These men interested in their own affairs. Who, then, can qualify? No one but those whom they may desire to have qualify and for whom they will put up the money.

Are we going to have this thing, Mr. President? It seems to me this bill, for that provision alone, should be sent back to the conference committee and amended. I do not desire to disfranchise all the people of that country. I do not believe that a man because he is not able to pay this five-dollar tax should be deprived of the right of voting at the next election. If such a restriction as that were imposed in this country, it would disfranchise millions of voters all over the North.

The Ohio coal miner earned, according to the chief mining inspector's report for 1897, $192 annually; and if he had a family of five, that would be less than $39 per capita, with which to educate, feed, clothe, and house an American citizen. In 1898 the report shows that the coal miners in Ohio earned $241 each, which, if there were five in a family, would be $48 per capita; and this was the average wage in the whole State. These figures are official. If you should impose a tax of $5 upon them they could not vote.

Are we going to spread this system from our dependencies to the rest of our country? Is this a precedent to be established by the Senate of the United States, by the Republican party, for the future government of this country? I hope not. Therefore, Mr. President, I hope the report will be rejected and this correction made.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I am inclined to do what I hesitate somewhat to do, and yet perhaps I ought to do it; and that is to take up each of the sections of this bill, with the changes which have been made, and point them out briefly, so that Senators may know what the bill contains somewhat easier and more quickly, at least, than they would be able to do if the discussion should go on without anything of that kind being done.

There are comparatively few amendments to the bill that are of very great importance and consequence. The first amendment which is found in the substitute is in section 4. That section provided:

SEC. 4. That all persons who were citizens of the Republic of Hawaii on August 12, 1898, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States and citizens of the Territory of Hawaii.

The amendment made to that section by the House, to which the conferees agreed, provides:

And all citizens of the United States who were resident in the Hawaiian Islands on or since August 12, 1898, and all the citizens of the United States who shall hereafter reside in the Territory of Hawaii for one year shall be citizens of the Territory of Hawaii.

The last provision was added by the House and agreed to by the conferees. It will be found in the print of the bill which has been furnished to the Senate to-day.

Before I go further, I desire to state that the amendments as they appear in the bill which was printed for the use of the Senate to-day only take in the amendments made by the House of Representatives, and not as they were finally agreed to by the conferees of the two Houses.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not understand that last expression.

Mr. CULLOM. I will state it again. On yesterday the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and others very properly raised a question of how they could tell what portion of the substitute bill which was reported to the Senate and which was passed by the House was originally passed by the Senate; and hence I made the statement yesterday, and I have tried to comply with it, that the Senate bill was taken up and every amendment made to it by the House has been incorporated in the print of the bill that is now before the Senate, so that Senators can see just what changes the House made in the bill as it passed the Senate; but I am stating now that this bill does not show the amendments or changes made by the conferees to the substitute bill, because Senators had that before them yesterday, and can have it before them to-day. It would have been impossible, without printing almost a book, to get all of the subject before the Senate, so that one could see at a glance exactly what changes have been made. Hence, I have taken this course; and I am calling the attention of the Senate to the amendments to the Senate bill made by the House, and as agreed to by the conferees; so that Senators get it all practically, though I do not propose to go into the details of the amendments in the remarks I am making.

Mr. COCKRELL. What change is made in section 4 as to citizenship?

Mr. CULLOM. I have just stated; but I will state it again, so that it may be understood.

Section 4, as passed by the Senate, provided—

That all persons who were citizens of the republic of Hawaii on August 12, 1898, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States and citizens of the Territory of Hawaii.

The House amended it, and the conferees agreed to the amendment by adding this provision:

And all citizens of the United States who were resident in the Hawaiian Islands on or since August 12, 1898, and all citizens of the United States who shall hereafter reside in the Territory of Hawaii for one year shall be citizens of the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator right there permit me to ask a question for information?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I desire to ask the Senator—I probably knew, but have forgotten the provision of the constitution of Hawaii on the subject—as to the extent of citizenship under the republic. Were all the inhabitants made citizens?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir. There are a class of citizens existing under the republic who declined to take the oath of allegiance.

Mr. BACON. And they were in consequence not citizens?

Mr. CULLOM. They were in consequence not entitled to vote.

Mr. BACON. But were they citizens of the republic?

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose they might be regarded as citizens of the republic.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will see the pertinency of that inquiry when that part of the section is taken in connection with the amendment to which the conferees have agreed, because if they were not citizens of Hawaii on August 12, 1898, they are not now under this bill made either citizens of the United States or citizens of the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. SPOONER. And they could not become citizens of the United States except by naturalization, and I do not know that they could by naturalization under the existing law.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the Senate will find that there is scarcely anybody over there who is not entitled to vote, except the Chinese and Japanese.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me for interrupting him. I am not speaking of the right to vote. A man can be a citizen and not have the right to vote. I am speaking of whether or not on the 12th day of August, 1898, all the inhabitants were citizens, because those of them who were then not citizens are excluded by this bill from being now made citizens. I suggest to the Senator that is a matter of such vital importance that we ought to have definite and absolutely accurate knowledge upon it. It ought not to be a matter of doubt.

Mr. TILLMAN. Has the Senator from Illinois got the Hawaiian code before him at his desk?

Mr. CULLOM. I was just going to say that after I get through with my remarks, I will get the Hawaiian code and give the exact state of the case in reference to that question.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will send for it now, I can be looking it up whilst he is speaking.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know whether or not it is in my committee room. It has been carried off, I think, but I shall look it up.

The fifth section was changed by the conferees so that it might be more certain that the Constitution of the United States was extended over the Territory by the act. That is the chief purpose of the amendment to section 5 by the House of Representatives as agreed to by the conferees.

Mr. BACON. What I wanted to know was whether or not the Senator was prepared to say that, under the constitution of the republic of Hawaii, all residents, all bona fide inhabitants—I do not mean visitors, but those who are residents and bona fide inhabitants of the islands—were on that date, under the constitution of the republic of Hawaii, citizens of the republic?

Mr. CULLOM. I understand the Senator's question, and I will state that later on I will get the statutes of the Hawaiian republic and see exactly how they are in that respect.

Mr. BACON. I suppose the Senator desires that we should, as he takes these sections up, ask him such questions as may suggest themselves. I think we shall save time by following that course.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that.

Sections 6, 7, 8, and 9 were not at all changed after the bill passed the Senate, but they remain in the bill just as it was passed.

Section 10 was amended by the House, but all the amendments made by the House were receded from except the last paragraph, which was added to the bill by the House and agreed to by the conferees. The Senate will remember that the first line of section 10 referred to obligations and contracts. The Senate struck those words out, and then added a section or two with reference to the attitude of contract laborers over there, which was agreed upon by the Senate, I think, as substantially if not absolutely right. Those sections remain in the bill exactly as they were, except that there was a provision added to the section to which I will call the attention of the Senate.

The last paragraph of section 10 provides:

That the act approved February 26, 1885, "To prohibit the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labor in the United States, its Territories, and the District of Columbia," and the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, be, and the same are hereby, extended to and made applicable to the Territory of Hawaii.

It was thought that that was not necessary to be in the bill, but it did not hurt anything and made it certain that the provision touching that subject would be recognized as applicable and in force in those islands. So, with that addition to section 10, as the Senate passed it, the bill stands to-day as it is before the Senate in the conference report.

Section 11, providing for the style of process, was amended by the conferees so as to insert the word "hereafter." That is all that amounted to. Some of us did not think it was necessary, but one of the conferees thought it was, and so the word was inserted.

Sections 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, as they passed the Senate, have not been changed.

The eighteenth section, providing that every citizen entitled to vote shall take an oath to support the Constitution, was stricken out, and only that portion retained relating to idiots, insane persons, persons receiving bribes, etc.

Mr. BACON. That has been retained.

Mr. CULLOM. The latter clause in relation to idiots, insane persons, persons receiving bribes, etc., remains in the bill, but the first part of the section is stricken out.

Mr. BACON. I notice that the clause to which the Senator refers, beginning on page 11, at line 24, in the copy I have, is stricken through. I understand that was stricken out in the House and has been restored by the conferees. Is that so?

Mr. CULLOM. What clause is that?

Mr. BACON. On page 11 of the reprint, the last clause to which the Senator has just referred.

Mr. CULLOM. That which I read is retained.

Mr. BACON. It has a line stricken through it.

Mr. CULLOM. But it was reinstated by the conferees.

Mr. BACON. That was the question I asked.

Mr. CULLOM. Sections 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24 were not interfered with by the House, and no changes were made in those sections as passed by the Senate.

The twenty-fifth section was amended so as to punish persons for disorderly or contemptuous behavior in committee, as well as in the house of representatives, to which the conferees agreed; in other words, we inserted the House provision on that subject instead of the Senate provision, which seemed to be a little more satisfactory. I do not think there was much difference in the two sections; but the Senate yielded on that score.

There was no change made in the Senate bill in the twenty-sixth section, but in the twenty-seventh section the provision of the Senate was stricken out and in lieu of it the following was inserted:

SEC. 27. That each house may punish its own members for disorderly behavior or neglect of duty, by censure, or by a two-thirds vote suspend or expel a member.

That is the provision I referred to.

There was no change made by the House or by the conferees in sections 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, and 33, and they remain in the bill as it was passed by the Senate.

In the thirty-fourth section, relating to the qualifications of senators, an amendment was made requiring senators to have attained the age of 30 years instead of 25 years.

There was no change made in sections 35 and 36. In section 37, after the word "vacancies," the words "in the office of representative" were inserted.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me a moment. The Senator will recognize that section 34 may be very materially dependent for its construction upon the section to which I first called the attention of the Senator, which relates to the question as to whether or not all inhabitants were citizens on the 12th of August, 1898; because if it should be found to be, as has been suggested, that there was a large part of the then inhabitants not citizens, they would be made ineligible, of course, under this language inserted in section 34, to any office, because they could not vote.

Mr. CULLOM. I was going to say that this section provides that a person, in order to be eligible to the office of senator, shall be a male citizen of the United States and shall have attained the age of 30 years, instead of 25 years, and—have resided in the Hawaiian Islands not less than three years, and shall be qualified to vote for senators in the district from which he is elected.

Mr. BACON. I understand; but I was simply calling the attention of the Senator to the fact that it may be necessary to recur to that section if it is found necessary to amend section 34.

Mr. CULLOM. The purpose of the committees of both Houses was finally that, barring Asiatics, every other man in the Territory should have the right to vote.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question, if he will recur to section 28 of the Senate bill. Upon what theory was it that the clause there giving to each house the power to determine the rules of its proceedings was stricken out? What objection was there to that?

Mr. CULLOM. It is section 27.

Mr. SPOONER. It was section 28 in the Senate bill, and provided—

That each house may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

Upon what theory was the phrase "That each house may determine the rules of its proceedings" stricken out? Do you think we can improve much upon the Constitution of the United States and all the State constitutions on that subject?

Mr. CULLOM. The supposition is that they have that right. Each house is to determine the rules of its own proceedings.

Mr. SPOONER. The framers of the Constitution of the United States did not proceed upon that theory, nor did the framers of the constitutions of the various States.

Mr. CULLOM. That may be.

Mr. SPOONER. That is true.

Mr. CULLOM. The truth is that each house the world over determines the rules by which it governs its own proceedings; but the provision put in here that each house may punish its own members for disorderly behavior, neglect of duty, etc., seemed to be necessary. The House conferees insisted upon it, and we consented to it.

Mr. BACON. May I ask the Senator how are the qualifications of the members of the two houses to be determined if this conference report shall be adopted and the bill becomes a law?

Mr. SPOONER. If the provision is left in that each house shall have the power to determine the elections and qualifications of its own members——

Mr. CULLOM. There was no change there, I think. I was referring to the thirty-fourth section, as to the qualifications of senators; that the age for a senator should be fixed at 30 years instead of at 25 years.

There is no change made in the thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth sections.

In section 37, after the word "vacancies," the words "in the office of representative" were inserted. As the bill stood it was somewhat indefinite, and so those words were put in by the conferees.

There is no change made in section 38 of the Senate bill, and there is no change in section 39.

At the end of section 40 the words "in the district from which he was elected" were inserted, and the conferees agreed to that. The suggestion was that without those words a member of the senate might be elected from a district in which he did not reside.

There were no changes in sections 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, and 51, except the last clause of section 51 was stricken out of the Senate bill and in lieu of it a paragraph was inserted by the House, which stated the law more clearly, but which is substantially the same thing, as I construe it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What change does the Senator say has been made in section 40?

Mr. CULLOM. At the end of the section the words "in the district from which he was elected" were inserted.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not see anything in the print of the bill I have to indicate any change of that kind.

Mr. SPOONER. That is section 34, on page 16 of the reprinted bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Illinois said section 40.

Mr. CULLOM. I did; and I have an impression, though I am not sure of it——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. These amendments ought to appear at the places indicated.

Mr. CULLOM. The provision as to residence is made applicable, as I think, to the whole of the section referring to senators and representatives.

Mr. SPOONER. There is no reason why it should refer to one and not to the other.

Mr. CULLOM. No; I think not; but I say I thought when I prepared this statement that we had actually made the amendment applicable to senators and representatives alike.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then why should not the print of the bill show it?

Mr. CULLOM. The bill does not show that as to the house of representatives, but I take it it will be so construed, at any rate.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I should hardly think so. If the law provides that the senator shall be a resident of the district from which he is elected, but makes no provision whatever on the subject as to the representative, the inference would be very clear that that restriction was not intended to be placed upon the representative.

Mr. CULLOM. I find that the House bill as amended by the conferees does have the provision in it, and it reads:

And shall be qualified to vote for representatives in the district from which he is elected.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What section?

Mr. CULLOM. That is section 40.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then it is a mistake in the print we have on our desks.

Mr. CULLOM. That has been dropped out by my clerk.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is in the official copy—the conference report?

Mr. CULLOM. It is in the copy before the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In the conference report, signed?

Mr. CULLOM. The report is signed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Are those words added?

Mr. CULLOM. The words are added in red ink in this copy?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In this copy there is nothing to show there is an amendment of that kind, but if it is in the conference report, of course it is all right.

Mr. CULLOM. I will read it. The original provision as it passed the House simply read as follows:

And shall be qualified to vote for representatives.

The conferees then added the words:

In the district from which he is elected.

Mr. BACON. It is in the reprint which we had on yesterday, which shows——

Mr. CULLOM. It was left out of it by mistake. There is no possible doubt about it being in the bill to be adopted.

Mr. SPOONER. That is all right.

Mr. CULLOM. Is that satisfactory to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Entirely so. If it is in the official copy, it makes no difference whether it is in this copy or not; it will be all right.

Mr. CULLOM. It is. I ran over the numbers of the sections of the Senate bill wherein no changes are made, being sections 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, and 51, except the last clause of section 51, which was stricken out of the Senate bill, and in lieu of it a paragraph was inserted by the House which stated the law more clearly, but which, I think, is substantially the same thing.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Is there not a change in section 47? The word "chairman" is stricken out and the words "presiding officer" inserted in italics. I do not know what this print means exactly.

Mr. CULLOM. That is in the bill. It is pretty difficult in handling so many bills to state the facts offhand. To what section does the Senator refer now?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Section 47. The word "chairman" is stricken out and the words "presiding officer" inserted. It is a very small matter.

Mr. CULLOM. That is in the bill before the Senate. I recollect it very well.

I wish to say that some of the sections I regarded as of very little consequence, and I did not incorporate them in this statement, because I did not have the time, and it would have required a good deal of work to do it so as to have what I state in my remarks accord exactly with the facts in the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I see that in section 46 of this reprint, with respect to the reading of bills, it is provided—

That a bill, in order to become a law, shall, except as herein provided, pass three readings in each house on separate days.

The words "on separate days" are in italics, and of course that is an amendment. Was that agreed to by the conferees?

Mr. CULLOM. I would rather read it, so as to be sure. What section is that?

Mr. SPOONER. Section 46.

Mr. CULLOM. This is the way the bill reads as reported:

That a bill, in order to become a law, shall, except as herein provided, pass three readings in each house, on separate days, the final passage of which in each house shall be by a majority vote of all the members to which such house is entitled, taken by yeas and nays and entered upon its journal.

That is the section as it appears in the conference report. Is that satisfactory?

In section 52, as will be seen by the Senate, the word "Hawaii" was stricken out and the words "Territory of Hawaii" substituted, to make it more clear and so that it should be more properly stated. That is the only change from the Senate section. I think I would rather use the conference report for the next item.

In section 53 there was no change made in the Senate section. I now come to section 54, and here is a provision about which I have no doubt there will be difference of opinion in the Senate, and I will read the whole of the section:

That in case of failure of the legislature to pass appropriation bills providing for payments of the necessary current expenses of carrying on the government and meeting its legal obligations as the same are provided for by the then existing laws, the governor shall, upon the adjournment of the legislature, call it in extra session for the consideration of appropriation bills—

Down to and including that word it reads exactly as does the Senate bill. I call attention to the remainder of the section. The Senate struck out the remainder of the section, the House restored it, and finally the conferees agreed to it. It reads as follows:

and until the legislature shall have acted the treasurer may, with the advice of the governor, make such payments, for which purpose the sums appropriated in the last appropriation bill shall be deemed to have been reappropriated. And all legislative and other appropriations made prior to the date when this act shall take effect shall be available to the government of the Territory of Hawaii.

That provision was not in the Senate bill; it was in the House bill, and the Senate conferees finally agreed to it.

Mr. BACON. I think that is a question about which there was a great deal of discussion when the bill was before the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senate struck it out.

Mr. BACON. I understand that. The Senate struck it out after elaborate debate. It is true it is limited to current expenses; and if there were a provision there which limited the time within which the governor should call the extra session of the legislature, I do not know that there would be any very great objection to it. But there is no limitation of time; and if the governor—of course we will not presume that he will fail to do his duty——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will pardon me, it says the governor shall, upon the adjournment of the legislature, call an extra session.

Mr. BACON. I understand, but it does not state within what time it shall be convened. He might put it off ten months.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Upon the adjournment of the legislature, I should think, means immediately.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. What about the situation in Pennsylvania?

Mr. BACON. Very well, if it will be so construed.

Mr. CULLOM. While that is not a usual provision in legislation, yet after considerable contest and controversy and discussion the Senate conferees agreed to it, believing that if it did not turn out to be satisfactory and work well it could be repealed hereafter.

Section 55 contains an amendment made by the House and agreed to by the conferees, which is to strike out the word "or" and insert "and;" so that it will read:

That no corporation, domestic or foreign, shall acquire and hold real estate, etc.

I have not quoted the whole section, but Senators can see the provision in the bill. The purpose of it is to limit the holding of real estate by corporations to a thousand acres.

Mr. BACON. It seems to me that this is an exceedingly drastic amendment. I think the limitation of the number of acres a corporation may hold is all right. We have a similar law in my own State; but for it to go on and prescribe that whenever such title shall pass to a corporation it shall immediately escheat to the Government of the United States, it seems to me, is an extremely rigid provision. There ought to be rather than that some provision by which the court could distribute the property or administer the property in the interest of those justly entitled to it. But it ought not to say that if, by any means, title shall vest in a corporation——

Mr. SPOONER. It may take it in payment of debts.

Mr. BACON. Certainly. There are a number of ways in which a corporation may come into title, legal or equitable, to property, and to say that it shall be immediately forfeited—I do not know that there is any parallel to such a provision in any law, State or Federal. I certainly have never heard of one.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senate knows and the country knows that the tendency in those islands—and we are not entirely free from it anywhere else in this country—is for corporations to accumulate immense tracts of land and prevent the ordinary citizen or newcomer from getting a footing at all in real estate; and the purpose of this was to stop that if we could.

Mr. BACON. I think that is entirely proper.

Mr. CULLOM. And let the people get homesteads and tracts of land to cultivate, and for other purposes.

Mr. BACON. I think it is entirely proper to stop it, but the question is whether the remedy is a proper one. It would be very well to prohibit it, and then leave it to the courts to say what shall become of the property. Of course, if this last provision were not in it, and legal proceedings were not had to prevent a corporation from holding it, the courts would distribute the property necessarily to those who are entitled to it. They would administer it in the interest of those who are entitled to it. But here is an express provision that if a corporation ever does acquire such title, it shall immediately, without any possibility of appeal or redress of any kind, be forfeited, and escheat to the Government of the United States. I think, if there is no other thing, that that single provision ought to be sufficient to induce the Senate to send the report back to the conference committee in order that it may be corrected.

Mr. CULLOM. My judgment is that it is a tolerably salutory provision for that Territory for a while, if not always, and I hope it will remain in the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. I notice that accompanying the same provision there is no interference with existing or vested rights, and therefore the question arises at once whether or not there are not now corporations which hold in excess, and a good many of them, and that these existing corporations, the sugar companies of which we have heard so much, will thereby, under this provision, have a monopoly, so to speak, of the right of having enough capital, for instance, to organize a sugar factory. We know that unless there is something like a thousand acres or more than that tributary to a large sugar mill it can not run; and would not the existing sugar mills force all the balance of the country capable of being planted in sugar to be tributary to them by reason of the fact that no other corporations could organize? There must be some hidden purpose here. I am not now insinuating that the Senator from Illinois is cognizant of it or in any way mixed up in it, but I should like to know why this provision is put in here.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator wants to find out how it got in here, he will have to go to the House of Representatives.

Mr. TILLMAN. It was put in in the House, and the Senator said he thought possibly it was a salutory one. I threw out the idea which occurred to me, and I should like to have the Senator explain it, if he knows anything about it.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator knows, and he has already stated, that there are very large corporations there——

Mr. TILLMAN. And they are not interfered with.

Mr. CULLOM. How are you going to interfere with them? You can not interfere with them by law.

Mr. TILLMAN. If one corporation is good——

Mr. CULLOM. How can you do it? You can pass a law that will prevent a continuation of the grasping spirit of these people and restrict their power to get possession of all the land.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Does the Senator from Illinois admit that corporations now holding more than a thousand acres would not be limited by this provision?

Mr. CULLOM. They will be limited as to buying any more, but we can not interfere with what they have if they have a deed to it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should think the Government has power to limit their right to hold real estate. In this paragraph the language is to acquire or to hold.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator will see in the latter part of the paragraph a provision for the protection of corporations now in existence.

Mr. SPOONER. It is prospective in its operation.

Mr. CULLOM. It is prospective entirely.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The paragraph will be entirely harmless for the reason that any body of men can organize just as many corporations as they please, each holding a thousand acres, and run them all under one management. Further than that, the land is all taken up anyway. There remain nothing but volcanic fields of lava and a few thousand acres of high ground between the two great mountains of the island of Hawaii, which is adapted to grazing purposes. The missionaries have captured it all and organized corporations, and got the control of everything worth having.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then why put in this provision prohibiting them invading that beautiful paradise any more?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know whether or not the Senator from South Carolina is answering the Senator from South Dakota, but the provision is in there, and on its face it is for the future; to prevent hereafter the accumulation of these immense estates as against the masses of the people who may want to go there and get homes, if they can. That is all there is of it.

Mr. BACON. You allow corporations which have land in excess of the limitation to retain it?

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator tell me how he is going to get rid of the ownership of land by the corporations or individuals, either, to which they have title under the law?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think the Government has the right to limit the power of these corporations to hold real estate.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly it has.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. They are under the control of the Government, and the Government can do what it pleases with them.

Mr. CULLOM. That is the purpose of this provision.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. No.

Mr. CULLOM. Are you going to take away from them what they already have?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Why not say that no corporation in the islands shall hold more than 1,000 acres of real estate?

Mr. CULLOM. You may do that, and compel them to sell; but it seems to me there is no occasion for it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then there is no occasion for preventing any other corporations from holding any more than that hereafter.

Mr. CULLOM. Let me say that most of the corporations existing there have already acquired large tracts of land. In the interest of the production of sugar, they have been compelled to expend very large amounts of money, and if they had not done so the sugar plantations which they have established would not have been made at all, because otherwise they could not do it. I know the situation there. The sugar lands and sugar cultivation begin at the foot of the hills, and they go up the hill as far as they can get water on the land—on the island of Hawaii, for instance.

At one time they supposed that they had got as high up the hills as they could go, because they could not get water, but it turned out finally that they could erect pumping works, which cost hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars, and I do not know but that some of them cost millions of dollars, by which they throw the water up the hill say 500 feet more, and that makes an additional amount of land which becomes good sugar land. Such corporations exist there where they had to have water, and I do not think it would be fair to them to——

Mr. TILLMAN. I agree with the Senator from Illinois that it would not be fair to try to take those vested rights away, but I do not see why we should limit it and prevent new capital from going in and pumping water up other slopes elsewhere, unless the present occupants of the country want a monopoly of the growth and manufacture of sugar and desire to force all future enterprises to submit to their dictation as to toll.

Mr. CULLOM. The House passed the bill, and it seems to me it is plain what was desired. The Senate conferees believed that it was in the interest of the masses of the people, and finally agreed to the House amendment. That is all I can say about it, and I think it will work to the advantage of the people out there, stopping the abuse as well as we can under the general law.

The remark of the Senator from South Dakota that the lands are all gone already, and so on, I do not think is exactly true.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is practically true.

Mr. CULLOM. If it is true, as he says, this does not amount to anything?

Mr. PETTIGREW. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. If it had not been true, this provision would not have been put in by the House.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose not.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It does seem to me that this sort of legislation is absolutely indefensible. I do not see why you should undertake to make a rule applicable to people who may enter into this business that is not applicable to those already engaged in it.

Mr. CULLOM. The next is section 56. There is a slight amendment in it.

Mr. PETTUS. Before the Senator passes from this section, I wish to ask him a question. I see an amendment in this section—

Nor shall saloons for the sale of intoxicating drinks be allowed.

I do not believe in the idea of regulating the morals of other people until we get so that we do not have any such thing here. I do not see why the Congress of the United should prohibit it to other people.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I will read just what the amendment to that provision is. The words "nor shall saloons for the sale of intoxicating drinks be allowed" are stricken out, and words inserted as follows:

Nor shall spirituous or intoxicating liquors be sold except under such regulations and restrictions as the Territorial legislature shall provide.

Mr. PETTUS. That does not appear in this copy.

Mr. CULLOM. It is in the conference report. No amendment made by the conferees appears in the bill which the Senator has. Is that satisfactory to the Senator?

Mr. PETTUS. If that is to be the law, it is.

Mr. CULLOM. That is in the bill reported by the conferees.

Sections 57 and 58 were not amended.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me? There is an amendment marked here at the end of section 55—

No retrospective law shall be enacted.

Mr. CULLOM. That was stricken out.

In section 59 the minority provision with respect to voting for representative was stricken out by the House and agreed to by the conferees. The Senate had a provision in the bill which provided for what we call minority representation. They had it out there, and it being in Illinois, so far as I was concerned, I was willing that it should stay in the bill. The House struck it out, and I was entirely satisfied to let it go. I suppose the Senate is.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator tell us why he changed the mandatory provision in regard to the creation of counties? It was "shall" in the Senate bill and is "may" in the conference report.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What section is that?

Mr. TILLMAN. Section 56 in the conference report.

Mr. CULLOM. We have gone by that. The conferees regarded the word "may" as all that was necessary.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator stated that there was no change in section 56.

Mr. CULLOM. It is left in the discretion of the legislature to do as it thinks best.

Mr. SPOONER. I think that is an improvement.

Mr. TILLMAN. It depends upon whether they propose to have an oligarchy in Honolulu and to run the whole business and make everybody come over there, or allow the people to have some local self-government.

Mr. CULLOM. This is in the direction of local self-government in that respect. The power remains in Congress to change it if it turns out not to be satisfactory. If any portion of the people get possession of the government by appointment to office or otherwise and abuse the people, the power will be in the hands of Congress to change it whenever it chooses.

Section 60 was amended by the House and subsequently amended by the conferees, so that the provision will read as I will read it. I think I had better read it from the substitute bill reported by the conferees, so that we may know exactly what it is. The fifth subdivision of section 60, as agreed to by the conferees, reads as follows:

Fifth. Prior to such registration have paid on or before the 31st day of March next preceding the date of registration all taxes due by him to the government.

That is the provision which was discussed by the Senator from South Dakota before I took the floor. That is as it appears in the conference report.

Mr. BACON. I think slight consideration will show that to be a very great injustice to the people of Hawaii, because the 31st day of March is already passed, and these people have not heretofore been recognized as having taken advantage of the conditions prescribed by the law; and with this remaining as it is, it will limit the voters in the next election to those who voted in the former election, which, I understand, is less than 3,000 people in the whole islands. I may be mistaken about that, but if so, I hope the Senator from Illinois will point out in what way I am mistaken, because if that is the truth it certainly ought not to be approved by the Congress or made the law by the Congress. We should not put in the organic law a provision in which there is a date fixed which absolutely and irrevocably determines that in the original organization of this Territory nobody shall vote except those who voted in the last election. That is practically the effect of it. If it is not the effect of it, I hope the Senator from Illinois will point it out.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is another phase of this question. I think this is the most important matter in the whole bill. The per capita taxes in Hawaii are $5—$1 for poll tax and $2 for schools and $2 for roads. It is in this bill, and the Senate provision, which they have left in, simply provides that those $5 must have been paid before the 31st day of March or no person can register for the next election. I am speaking now about those who do not pay anything but the capitation taxes, the poor men. Therefore we will limit the suffrage to those who have paid their poll taxes of $5 prior to the 31st day of March, just gone. Under that provision as it stands, as the Senator from Georgia just pointed out, the suffrage will be limited to that extent that the electors in the next election will have it in their power to elect a legislature which may double or treble the poll tax, and these poor devils never will get the franchise.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is unquestionably the purpose of the bill. As the bill was first brought into the Senate it was clearly the purpose to limit the franchise simply to sugar planters and the men in their employ. That provision we corrected in a measure in the Senate. But we left in this provision. Now, the House corrected it by providing for a poll tax of $1, but the conferees on the part of the Senate appear to have insisted upon this provision, which disqualifies practically everyone from voting except those whom the sugar planters want to have vote. Under this provision a graduate of Yale or Harvard College, if he failed to pay the poll tax on the 31st day of last March, is disqualified from voting for members of the legislature, and then the next legislature can impose conditions which would shut him out forever. It does not seem to me that this ought to be tolerated.

There are other taxes. The law provides that an annual tax of $1 shall be paid by every male inhabitant of the Territory between the ages of 20 and 60 years, unless exempted by law. It also provides that an annual tax of $2 for the support of public schools shall be paid by every male inhabitant of the Territory between the ages of 20 and 60 years, unless exempted by law.

The next paragraph provides that an annual road tax of $2 shall be paid by every male inhabitant of this Territory between the ages of 20 and 60 years, unless exempted by law.

Then there is a tax on personal property, and then there is this provision:

SEC. 814. All male animals of the dog kind shall be subject to an annual tax of $1 each, and all female animals of the dog kind shall be subject to an annual tax of $3 each, to be paid by the owner thereof.

So if a man has a dog or two dogs, there is an additional tax of $4. Then there is this further provision:

SEC. 832. If any property taxes shall remain unpaid after the 15th day of November in any year, 10 per cent of the amount of such taxes shall be added by the assessor to the amount of such taxes at said date, and shall become and be collected as part of such taxes.

SEC. 833. If any personal taxes or dog tax shall remain unpaid after the 31st day of March, 10 per cent of such taxes shall be added to the amount of such taxes at said date by the assessor, and shall be collected as part of such taxes.

Therefore if those people have failed to pay for two or three years, the tax runs up to many dollars. The probabilities are that there is an exceedingly small number of people who will be able to vote under this provision. At the last election in Hawaii I understand that there were about 2,200 votes cast. Under this provision I believe the number must certainly sink far below that figure. Yet at the last election held under the monarchy, before they established a republic in that country, there were between 13,000 and 14,000 voters in Hawaii, and that excluded all the Asiatics.

I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Illinois, who is more familiar with this subject than I am. I want to know whether this provision has been repealed?

Mr. CULLOM. Which provision is that?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is paragraph 864 of the laws of Hawaii.

Mr. CULLOM. I would not be able to answer that unless I took the time to go through all the sections, paragraphs, chapters, etc., which have been repealed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to call the attention of the Senator——

Mr. CULLOM. But I can answer in a general way that all the laws of Hawaii not inconsistent with the Constitution or the laws of the United States or with the provisions of this act shall continue in force, subject to repeal or amendment by the legislature of Hawaii.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Now, here is this provision:

SEC. 863. In case of personal taxes due and unpaid on the 1st day of January in each year, if no personal property can be found whereon to distrain, the assessor may cause the arrest and detention of the person of such taxpayer by and under a warrant issued and signed by the assessor or his deputy, in substance in the form following, viz:

Territory of Hawaii, island of ——, district of ——:

To ——, chief sheriff, or any constable or police officer of the district of ——, island of —— of ——, in the island of ——, having failed and neglected to pay the sum of —— dollars assessed upon him for personal taxes for the year — —, now due and unpaid, and no property being found belonging to the said —— whereon to levy by distress:

Therefore, by virtue of the authority in me vested by law, I hereby order and command you to forthwith arrest and take said —— before ——, district magistrate of ——, island of ——, to show cause, if any he has, why he, the said — —, should not be sentenced by said magistrate to be imprisoned at hard labor until he discharge the amount of said tax and costs as by law provided.

Hereof fail not, but of this order, with your proceedings thereon, make due return. Given under my hand this —— day of ——, A. D. ——.

——, ——,

Assessor of —— Division, Island of ——.

SEC. 864. The officer receiving such warrant shall forthwith arrest the person therein named and take him before the district magistrate named in the warrant. Such magistrate shall, if no legal cause be shown for the nonpayment of said personal taxes, sentence such person to be imprisoned at hard labor until he discharge the amount of such taxes and the costs of arrest and hearing at the rate of 50 cents per day.

Costs shall be the usual costs of district courts.

The payment at any time of the amount of taxes and costs due shall release the person arrested.

I have seen the Republican papers of the North protesting very loudly that some of the Southern States had enacted a provision like this.

Mr. TILLMAN. What is the number of the section that the Senator from South Dakota has read?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am reading from the laws of Hawaii, page 121, sections 863 and 864. As I understand it, this provision is not repealed. In other words, we reenact it, and that, along with the disfranchisement of these people, it seems to me will leave the Republican party where it can no longer complain, no matter what conditions are imposed by any State or any locality to disfranchise the inhabitants of any State or locality.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I am not able to get my eye on all of the sections that bear upon this question. Of course at the regular election that provision could be enforced. My belief is, however, that at the first election, if an election should be called by the governor before the regular session, there would be no requirement on the part of the governor and no rule by which he could be governed as to the registration at all, and he could register everybody if he wanted to do so.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It does not say so.

Mr. CULLOM. I think there are sections which result in that conclusion. Of course it applies to regular elections; but if it applies to regular elections, perhaps it will be said it might as well apply to all.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator's construction of that is correct, why do you put in the words "prior to such registration?"

Mr. PETTIGREW. Why did you not agree to the House provision?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes. It is "prior to such registration" that this tax has to be paid. So when the registration comes to be made, the question whether he has paid this tax will be raised.

Mr. CULLOM. The provision reads "prior to each regular election;" not special but regular election.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am reading it, which is the best that I can do. It says "prior to such registration."

Mr. CULLOM. I understand. From what section is the Senator reading?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am reading paragraph 5 of section 60, the one which contains the language the Senator read a few minutes ago.

Mr. CULLOM. Let us see how it reads in the bill. Section 60 reads as follows:

SEC. 60. That in order to be qualified to vote for representatives a person shall—

First. Be a male citizen of the United States.

Second. Have resided in the Territory not less than one year preceding and in the representative district in which he offers to register not less than three months immediately preceding the time at which he offers to register.

Third. Have attained the age of 21 years.

Fourth. Prior to each regular election, during the time prescribed by law for registration, have caused his name to be entered on the register of voters for representatives for his district.

Fifth. Prior to such registration have paid, on or before the 31st day of March next preceding the date of registration, all taxes due by him to the government.

All that refers to the regular election.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. But the language of the law that you propose distinctly says that "prior to such registration" this tax must be paid.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The person can not be registered unless the taxes are paid.

Mr. CULLOM. That is true.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then the purpose of it is to cut him out. That is exactly the complaint made by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. He can not vote at any election.

Mr. CULLOM. That connects with the fourth paragraph, referring to the regular election.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the person is not registered, he can not vote at any election.

Mr. CULLOM. I think he can; but whether he can or not, in the first place, the people who I suppose the Senator would think were affected most by that paragraph are the native Hawaiians. The truth is that they have never had any trouble with the native Hawaiians on the question of preparing themselves for voting.

Mr. TELLER. Why?

Mr. CULLOM. Because they are always ready to pay their tax.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There will be trouble after this.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the Senator will allow me, it is well known to the commission who visited the islands and to everybody else that the native Hawaiians did not register and did not vote because they protested against the overthrowing of their government by these people.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course many of them did not vote.

Mr. PETTIGREW. They are not registered, and they have not voted.

Mr. CULLOM. But it was not because they did not pay their taxes. It was because they did not know what was going on and did not feel satisfied at first to vote under the republic. That is the meaning of that.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Does the Senator from Illinois admit as correct the fact stated by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], as he understands it, that the present poll tax in the Hawaiian Islands is $3 per head?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know what it is.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have just read the law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Here is the law of Hawaii, with the section providing for a capitation tax.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If that is the case, aside from every other fact presented in connection with this matter in the Senate, the Senate ought to reject the conference report for that reason. Here is the provision that went to conference:

Prior to such registration have paid a poll tax of $1 for the current year.

The Senate conferees agreed to strike that out, and the House put in the provision that "on or before the 31st day of March next preceding the date of registration all taxes due by him to the Government" shall be paid. To leave that poll tax of $3 per head in force against the poor people of that island is a shame, as it seems to me, and it ought not to be tolerated.

I believe that for that reason, and that alone, the Senate ought to send this conference report back to the conference committee and let them bring back a provision for a tax of not more than a dollar a head. The truth is, that with the wealth that has been accumulated in this great country of ours I have begun to believe and to feel that to collect a tax from a man who has no property, simply because he breathes the air of this free Republic—a tax of even $1 a head—is wrong; that it ought not to be tolerated. None of our States, so far as I know, collect more than a dollar a head of poll tax, and that is enough in all conscience. That is one which has been sanctioned a long time, and I would make no special objection to it, though I would very much prefer to have none. When the proposition is that we shall pass a law here that shall impose a collection of $5 per head of poll tax, I for one am not willing to submit to it under any conceivable circumstances.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator gets very much excited about a small thing.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Five dollars a head is no small thing for a poor man.

Mr. CULLOM. I never thought much of a poll tax; and when that poll-tax provision was stricken out, I supposed, as a matter of fact, that the people there who are entitled to vote would probably have no tax to pay at all; that if they do not own anything they would not have to pay a tax; and if they do own anything on which they should pay a tax, they ought to pay it. That is all there is of that.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yet the Senator admits that there is a poll tax of $5 a head on all those people, as was read from the law here. This is a proposition to keep that in force.

Mr. CULLOM. But it remains for the legislature to wipe that poll tax out, and any other tax that is burdensome to the people.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. When you allow a handful of men who own the property and are interested in making the poor people pay a poll tax to select a legislature, it is something like submitting the lamb to the tender mercies of the wolf.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator goes on the theory that if a man owns anything, he is bound to oppress somebody. I do not believe in that doctrine myself.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois, if it is agreed that this principle shall be applied only to taxes on property, what is the objection to letting the report go back and have the poll-tax provision stricken out?

Mr. CULLOM. I would abolish the poll tax if I did anything with it. I do not believe in it.

Mr. TELLER. I do not, either. I do not believe that anybody ought to be compelled to pay a tax before he votes. I do not think anybody ought to buy his suffrage in that way.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator is aware that in some of the States they have a poll tax, and probably the Senator knows how it works. The politicians or candidates run around and try to find everybody who is not able to pay the poll tax to vote for them, and they offer to pay the poll tax.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say to the Senator that is the only objection I have to a poll tax. Since I have been a member of the Senate I was told by a man in public life, holding a high office, that he had bought $40,000 worth of poll taxes in his State. Now, that is an indirect way of purchasing votes.

Mr. CULLOM. Exactly.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not so very indirect, either.

Mr. TELLER. Well, it is just about as direct as when a candidate pays any indebtedness. If a man owes $5 and some candidate desires his vote and pays it and gets his vote, that is a purchase of that vote. I say it is absolutely inconsistent with the principle of good government to make the suffrage conditioned upon paying taxes. I am in favor of striking out all that provision, and I think the Senate would be in favor of it if we could get a vote on that proposition. It certainly is not a wise thing to do. A man may have but little property and not be able to pay the tax. Should he be deprived of his citizenship?

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me, we struck out the property qualification.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; we intended to give free suffrage there, and we did not intend to give it after this legislature had given it to them. We intended to give it to them ourselves, so that they might be able to vote in the next election.

Mr. CULLOM. As a matter of fact, when we struck out the poll tax, if I may be allowed to state the fact——

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. It was largely on my motion. I did not believe in it.

Mr. TILLMAN. You mean the property qualification?

Mr. CULLOM. No; I mean in conference. When it was suggested that a voter before registering should pay his taxes, it occurred to me that the poor man did not have any to pay if he did not own property; that the great mass of the poor people not owning much, if anything, would not have any tax to pay at all, and therefore it would be much easier for him to pay a little tax, if he had anything to pay it on, than to be constrained to pay a poll tax.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Now, as the Senator finds there is a tax of $5 a head, I suppose he will be perfectly willing to have the report go back to the conference committee and let that be stricken out.

Mr. CULLOM. If it should go back, I would be in favor of striking it out; of course I would.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in and to the government of the Philippine Islands ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the further consideration of the conference report. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before that is agreed to, I wish to say that there were one or two Senators who intended to speak upon the Pennsylvania resolution to-day. This conference report has occupied so much time that they will not speak to-day, and that resolution may go over until to-morrow if it has not already gone over until to-morrow.

I also wish to say that to-morrow there must be debate upon the Pennsylvania resolution. There is only to-morrow and Monday and until 3 or 4 o'clock on Tuesday for debate, and Senators in charge of this measure and in charge of the Alaska code bill must take notice that to-morrow will be given to debate upon the Pennsylvania resolution. I see the Senator from Arkansas rising. He secured an understanding that anyone wishing to speak upon the Pennsylvania resolution should have preference, as I understood, over all other speakers and all other business.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. My understanding of that unanimous-consent agreement was that the Quay case was to be taken up and considered up to a certain time, giving preference to conference reports and appropriation bills, and that they had the right of way above every other consideration.

Now, I suppose there will be no difficulty about a general agreement to the proposition suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire that the resolution shall go on to-morrow, but I do not think he has a right to say to Senators that they must lay aside conference reports for the purpose of taking that case up to-morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was only doing it because I wanted to carry out the new understanding which the Senator from Arkansas secured when the agreement was made, that in addition to the continuous consideration there should be a vote on next Tuesday. I certainly was cooperating with him; I thought I was.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was no new unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Arkansas. I have always insisted that the Senate should observe the agreement they made, and I was simply calling the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to what the agreement was rather than finding fault with what he proposed.

Mr. CHANDLER. But certainly the Senator from Arkansas himself secured an understanding that up to next Tuesday at 3 or 4 o'clock—I forget what hour—at which the vote is to be taken——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At 4 o'clock.

Mr. CHANDLER. At 4 o'clock if anyone wished to speak upon the Pennsylvania resolution, he should have preference over all other speakers.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I stated he should have that right. But the Pennsylvania resolution was to be considered subject to the prior rights of appropriation bills and conference reports.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I did not understand the Senator from Arkansas aright. I do not think there will be any trouble about it, because I consent that the Pennsylvania resolution shall go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask the Senator from Illinois whether he will have concluded his remarks upon the conference report before the close of the routine morning business to-morrow?

Mr. CULLOM. It looks a little bit uncertain as to when I shall get through. But I am trying as best I can to give all the information that the Senate wants with reference to this bill.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion right here in regard to that point?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. STEWART. I am so unalterably opposed to making the payment of a poll tax a condition precedent to voting, and I am so unalterably opposed to a property qualification for voting, that I think it is a matter that should not be left in doubt in this case. I advise the Senator by all means to withdraw his report if there is any uncertainty about it and have it made certain. If we adopt an educational qualification, that I think is all right, and I agree to it. I agree that suffrage will be sufficiently exclusive in those islands with that qualification, but it ought not to go any further.

I have seen some of the operations of a poll tax. We had it in Nevada as a condition of voting, and it was a very demoralizing element in politics and led to abuses, and the people grew sick of it and repealed it. There is a general sentiment against it in the country where it has been tried. Any man who wants the vote will pay the tax, and the rich man will have it all in his hands. The poor man can not pay the tax, and it is just like buying his vote when another pays the tax for him. I hope the report will be returned and that that will be made certain. I could not vote for a conference report where there was any doubt on that question.

Mr. CULLOM. As the Senator from New Hampshire has made inquiry whether I am likely to get through with my remarks before Tuesday, I should like to be let alone until I can make them and see whether there is anything seriously in the way of the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator does not object to the Senate having information given as he goes along?

Mr. CULLOM. I certainly have not shown any disposition not to give all the information I could.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I thought the Senator said he did not want to be interrupted.

Mr. CULLOM. I have adopted this course, referring to each section and calling the attention of the Senators to each provision, so that when they come to vote they may have, so far as I am able to give it, the exact information in reference to the action of the conferees.

Mr. STEWART. Has the Senator any objection, when he calls up a particular subject, to have us make some remarks in regard to it with a view of having it understood? If we wait until he gets clear through and then take it up, we would have to make long speeches before we would get to understand it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CULLOM. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to direct the attention of Senators to the parliamentary status. If I am correct, it is that the Senate passed a bill and sent it to the House and the House amended it. Now, I understand that the conferees can not bring in anything that is outside of both bills unless it is germane to the subject under consideration. Can they bring in anything outside and not germane?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir; after it has been disposed of by both Houses. This provision, however——

Mr. TILLMAN. The conferees must either take the House provision or the Senate provision or some compromise that is germane to both.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as the provision under discussion is concerned, it is clearly within the control of the Senate as to what it shall do with the provision.

Mr. TILLMAN. You mean that you could strike out all taxes?

Mr. CULLOM. I mean to say that if it was referred back to the conferees they would have jurisdiction of it so that they could do as they chose about striking out the provision requiring that the voter shall pay his taxes, or leaving in the poll tax, or striking both provisions out. There is no question about that, I think.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is possible that the Senator is correct; but if I understand the powers of a conference committee, he is absolutely wrong. The provision as passed by the Senate was that—

> Prior to such registration have paid, on or before the 31st day of March next preceding the date of registration, all taxes due by him to the government.

Mr. CULLOM. But the Senator does not seem to understand that that very provision was taken cognizance of by the conferees, and that the conferees can reconsider it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me get through.

Mr. CULLOM. There is no doubt about the fact that the subject is open to consideration by the conferees. The House added the poll tax. The Senate took hold of the provision and struck that out and put in another. The conferees can strike them both out if they reconvene.

Mr. TILLMAN. They can strike the whole provision out?

Mr. CULLOM. The whole provision as to taxes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well, if that is within your power. I just wanted to find out whether you could do it or not.

Mr. CULLOM. There can not be any doubt about that, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. As I understand the parliamentary situation, it is that the Senate passed a bill for the establishment of a government in Hawaii. It went over to the House and the House struck out the entire Senate bill and passed another bill.

Mr. CULLOM. It passed another bill.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The two bills are in disagreement between the Senate and the House, and the conferees in their report could bring in any bill that they chose, and an entirely new one if they chose to do so.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course they could; but confining the conference to this particular paragraph, we can agree to either the poll tax or to the property tax.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Or to no tax?

Mr. CULLOM. Or to no tax, just as we choose.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The power is unlimited in that respect.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion in regard to what the Senator from Connecticut just now said, while I believe that what he said is technically true, I think it is a violation of all reasonable parliamentary precedent. I do not believe it was ever intended that the whole of a bill should be stricken out and another bill brought in, similar in terms, so as to leave the whole matter open. For instance, as I understand this paragraph, as it went first from the Senate there was a provision that—

> Prior to such registration have paid a poll tax of $1 for the current year, due by him to the government.

That is printed in roman and the words "a poll tax of $1 for the current year" are stricken out. I do not understand how that was done.

Mr. CULLOM. That is the House amendment. The conferees struck it out.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The conferees struck that out?

Mr. CULLOM. The conferees struck it out.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It was in the bill then as it was passed by the House?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then the Senate conferees would have a right to agree to that House amendment and leave that in?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. They would have a right to disagree to it and to leave the whole out?

Mr. CULLOM. Or substitute anything else.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think that is true as to that paragraph, but I do not believe that it is a fair parliamentary practice to strike out a whole bill, and without reference to what was passed in the Senate and to what was passed in the House, say that the entire subject is open for legislation in conference committee.

Mr. CULLOM. We have no right to criticise what the House has done.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It has been ruled so over and over again. It may not be good practice, but it is in the parliamentary power of the conferees.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not dispute that, but I say it is bad practice.

Mr. CULLOM. I thought myself when it was done that it was not exactly the right thing to do in dealing with the bill, especially as the greater part of the bill was retained by the House. So it embarrassed the whole situation as to the conduct of the proceeding. But still we are trying to deal with it the best we can.

Mr. SPOONER. We do that every day.

Mr. CULLOM. We do it almost every day between the two Houses, but it is not usually done on a bill so large and so important, I think.

If I may be allowed to go on—I do not know exactly where I quit.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. You were on page 27 of the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. The sixth paragraph of the section was stricken out by the House and the conferees agreed to the same. That refers to this same subject we have been discussing.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Does the Senator say that was stricken out?

Mr. CULLOM. The sixth paragraph.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then I do not understand——

Mr. CULLOM. I believe that is the section we were discussing.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have in my hands the print of the 18th, which is said to be——

Mr. CULLOM. You have the wrong bill. The 19th is the last print.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I know the 19th is the last print, but the 18th——

Mr. CULLOM. The 19th has the House amendments in it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly; but I wanted to get the proposition of the conferees.

Mr. CULLOM. Well, I shall have to read the conference report to show that. What section is the Senator on?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I was trying to find the section the Senator was reading. I understood he was reading the sixth paragraph of section 60.

Mr. CULLOM. The last paragraph I read was in reference to the registration of voters, which we have been discussing.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The fifth paragraph.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; the fifth paragraph. Now I come to section 61.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I thought the Senator said the sixth paragraph of section 60 was stricken out. This bill does not show that.

Mr. CULLOM. I did. That refers to some other section, I think.

Mr. PETTIGREW. A portion of it is stricken out, probably. The gist of it remains.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; I was referring to the sixth paragraph of section 60, which reads:

Sixth. Be able to speak, read, and write the English and the Hawaiian language.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Did the Senator say that was stricken out?

Mr. CULLOM. No.

Mr. SPOONER. The proviso is stricken out.

Mr. CULLOM. The proviso is stricken out, and that reads as follows:

Provided, however, That the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii may, at any time after January 1, 1903, submit to the lawfully qualified voters of such Territory such changes and modifications in the qualifications for electors as they shall see fit; and the same being adopted by a majority vote, taken in the mode prescribed by the legislature, shall be valid and binding as law.

That was stricken out, as it was not deemed necessary.

Mr. SPOONER. They have the power without it.

Mr. CULLOM. They have the power without it.

There was no change in section 61. Section 62 was amended so as to read:

SEC. 62. That in order to be qualified to vote for senators and for voting in all other elections in the Territory of Hawaii a person must possess all the qualifications and be subject to all the conditions required by this act of voters for representatives.

That was agreed to.

Section 63 provides:

SEC. 63. That no person shall be allowed to vote who is in the Territory by reason of being in the Army or Navy or by reason of being attached to troops in the service of the United States.

In section 64 there is a slight change from the Senate bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think the Senator has skipped the provision in section 63, for instance, with regard to the board of registration. The bill as the Senate passed it, I think, provided——

Mr. CULLOM. The provision was stricken out which required them to be of different parties.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes; and the House passed this provision: "No more than two of whom shall be of the same political party." Why was that stricken out by the conferees?

Mr. CULLOM. That was stricken out by the conferees on the theory that there were no parties in Hawaii.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In what section is that?

Mr. CULLOM. In lines 17 and 18, on page 29 of the bill, "no more than two of whom shall be of the same political party." There was some discussion on that subject, which did not amount to much, but the suggestion was made that there were no parties in Hawaii; we did not want to suggest any, and did not think it was necessary to insert such a provision in the bill.

There is no change in section 65, and there is no change in section 66 except that the House adopted an amendment that the governor shall be a citizen of the Territory, and so on, which was agreed to by the conferees.

In section 67 a provision was added, and agreed to by the conferees, that martial law or the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus should not continue longer than until communication could be had with the President and his decision thereon made known. That was added to the bill.

There is no change made in section 68.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Unless the Senator objects to being interrupted, I should like to ask why an exception was made in the case of Hawaii, which requires that the governor shall be a resident of that Territory?

Mr. CULLOM. Be a citizen of Hawaii.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Be a citizen, yes. None of the other Territories of the United States have any such provision. A man may be selected from anywhere to be governor of Arizona or New Mexico or Alaska or Porto Rico, for that matter. Why should an exception be made in Hawaii?

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I think the Senator himself has been a stickler for what is called home rule in Territorial appointments; but not in that regard. The people of Hawaii, however, are in a large degree a different class of people from those in the United States; they are of mixed races and from different countries. It was the opinion of all the conferees, I may say, except myself, that the provision requiring the appointee to be a citizen of the Territory ought to be retained in the bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Was that because of their incompetence?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir; it was because of their competence; and I desire to say, so far as that remark goes, that there are just as able lawyers in Hawaii, just as good merchants and business men, as you can find in any State of the Union at the present time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. But that is true also of Porto Rico; it was true of the Territory of Dakota; it is true of Arizona and New Mexico to-day, and it is true of Alaska, and yet there has never been any such provision as that.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In all our Territories the governor can be appointed from any part of the United States. Therefore the reason the Senator has given for this exception certainly can not be good.

Mr. CULLOM. But that does not furnish any reason why it should not be made, and therefore the conferees agreed to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is right, and the action in Porto Rico was wrong.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not running Porto Rico now.

As to section 73, with reference to public lands, the House amendment, on page 35, was stricken out and the Senate provision reinstated with a slight amendment, which I think makes it more definite as to the dates between which land transactions were carried on, which were afterwards suspended by the President. The Senate knows the history of that matter, and it is not necessary for me to take up time in discussing it. We put the provision back substantially, if not exactly, as it was passed by the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is the proviso in section 73 which you put back—"That all sales, grants, leases," etc.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; and ratifying the sale subject to the approval of the President. That is the substance of the provision.

In section 74 there was no change.

Section 75 of the bill relating to the appropriation of $15,000 was stricken out, and that was agreed to by the conferees. The Senate section of the bill in relation to the superintendent of public works was not changed.

In section 76 there was no change as to the provision relating to public instruction alone; but there was an amendment which the House passed providing for a commissioner of labor. The conferees rejected a part of that amendment and provided that the Commissioner of Labor of the United States should do all the work that was proposed by the provision as put in by the House. I think myself that was very wise action on the part of the conferees, because there is no man who can do such work better than can Mr. Wright, who has charge of all these matters.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The print of the bill is confusing. I can not understand everything in it; but I understand from the two prints together that a provision in the print of the 19th which was stricken out, marked section 76, went out of the bill in conference.

Mr. CULLOM. The $15,000 provision?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. CULLOM. All of that section goes out.

As I have stated, in section 76, relating to public instruction, there was no change from the section in the way it passed the Senate; but the House added to it a paragraph providing for a commissioner of labor to be appointed, who should report to the legislature, etc. The Senate conferees thought that was an unnecessary expenditure, and re-formed the section so that the work could be carried out by the Commissioner of Labor of the United States.

No changes are made in sections 77, 78, and 79.

In section 80 there were no changes except to strike out the words "commissioner of labor" where they were put in by the House. Section 80 was also amended by the House, and that was agreed to by the conferees, so as to provide that all officers appointed under the provisions of that section should be citizens of the Territory, and further, that all persons holding office, except as otherwise provided, should continue to hold their offices respectively until their successors should be appointed and qualified, but not beyond the first session of the senate of the Territory.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What section is that?

Mr. CULLOM. Section 80, at the end of the section. The provision placed in the bill by the House, providing that it should be the duty of the surveyor to report annually to the Department of Labor, was deemed by the conferees as unnecessary, and that provision was stricken out.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not suppose it will make any difference in the acceptance of this report, but I think it is a very great mistake to provide that all the officers to be appointed in that Territory, or the officers provided for in this section, shall be citizens of the Territory. I think we ought to reserve that power in the hands of the President. I do not think we ought to limit him in his exercise of the appointing power. It may work well, and it may work badly. There may a condition of things arise in that Territory where it will be almost imperatively necessary, to establish and to maintain order and secure good government, that persons other than citizens of that Territory shall be appointed to official positions there. I confess that I am a little tired of having the Congress of the United States dictated to by the people of Hawaii in this and other respects. I think we ought to legislate from this end and not from that end.

Mr. CULLOM. Well, Mr. President, that has been discussed more or less heretofore. All I can say in reply is that I have not the least idea that it will work badly in that Territory; but, on the contrary, I am very sure it will do no damage, but will probably work for the welfare of those people.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, unless the Senator desires not to be interrupted, I wish to say someting in this connection.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection. I want this talked out, so that we shall get a vote at some time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. As to all the other Territories of the United States, we do not require that the appointees shall be citizens and residents at the time of their appointment in order to hold the positions of judges, governors, etc. Why, then, should we make an exception as to Hawaii? I perceive no reason why this should be done.

The character of the population of Hawaii is certainly not a reason, because there are only 3,000 people of American descent or American blood upon the islands, and of those about 1,900 are males of all ages. Therefore, the field from which to select these officers is exceedingly small, unless we appoint them from among the Hawaiians; and of the native Hawaiians there are about 40,000; of the Chinese and Japanese between sixty and seventy thousand, and they are coming in constantly. There are about 16,000 Portuguese there. Is that the kind of a population which entitles Hawaii to be specially favored over Arizona and over New Mexico, where there are 100,000 Americans, and of the very best blood of America also?

The fact of the matter is that these men—about 19 Americans out of 1,900 males—have established an oligarchy. They control the sugar plantations and the sugar industry. They are men of enormous wealth. They are the recipients of the $80,000,000 we have remitted in duties; and they want to control and manage the government. There has been a steady effort from the start to fix this bill so that they may be able to manage the government. The bill that came in here put it absolutely in their hands, and now it is proposed to perpetuate it in their hands. The bill as amended by the Senate released their grasp. They have their lobbyists here to look after their interests. They have succeeded in getting provisions in the bill that they think most essential, so far as they could get them in, for a limitation of the suffrage, requiring that from their number shall be selected the officeholders of that country, so that they can get control of the governor, of the courts, and of the enormous veto power, so as to require two-thirds of the members of the legislature to overturn the veto, and so that they can use the courts for other purposes.

In the bill also we have provided that a man may be imprisoned and put at labor under a taskmaster if he fails to pay his tax, even his poll tax; and so far as possible we are undertaking to perpetuate this oligarchical government of a handful of enormously rich men, made rich by the taxation of the people of the United States in turning over to them the remitted duties. We have been trying to hedge their power around, but now it is proposed that the judges and the governor shall be selected from their ranks. Then we are told what great men they are and what enormous ability they have. It is simply a sample of the tendencies of this Government at the present time toward a plutocracy. We make one thing for Porto Rico, another thing for Hawaii, and something else for the Philippines. I fail to find any reason why this should be done.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, the Senator knows just as well as anybody else, when he compares the qualifications of the people of Porto Rico as equal to those of Hawaii, that it is not true. A large portion of the people of Hawaii are well qualified for self-government; and the Senator knows that the Porto Ricans, so far as we have any information about them, are not particularly well qualified for self-government.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Who is it in Hawaii that is particularly well qualified, except simply the Americans?

Mr. CULLOM. The Americans, the Englishmen, the Germans, the Portuguese, and many of the natives as well.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. I do not want to yield any longer.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I only want to answer one statement made by the Senator. He says I know——

Mr. CULLOM. I think you do.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am on the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, and before the committee came men from Porto Rico equal in intellect and ability to these Hawaiians, and I believe far exceeding them in character.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator knows, I think, that the great body of the people of Porto Rico can neither read nor write.

Mr. PETTIGREW. About 20 per cent of them.

Mr. CULLOM. He knows, I think, that nearly every man in Hawaii can read and write.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is true; but this bill as it now stands excludes them, even if they can read and write, from any participation in the Hawaiian government.

Mr. CULLOM. That is very easily said.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota—I ask him only for information—what warrant he has when he makes the statement that under this bill or under the law a man in Hawaii can be imprisoned for failure to pay his taxes? It may be true, but I have not noticed it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. We have not repealed this law of Hawaii:

SEC. 863. In case of personal taxes due and unpaid on the 1st day of January in each year, if no personal property can be found whereon to distrain, the assessor may cause the arrest and detention of the person of such taxpayer by and under a warrant issued and signed by the assessor or his deputy, in substance in the form following, viz.

Then it gives the form of the warrant.

The next section provides that the officer receiving such warrant——

Mr. HOAR. Read the form of the warrant. That is a very important part of it.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the warrant?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will read the form of the warrant. I did not think it was important. I thought what I read had covered the case pretty well, but I will read the last paragraph of section 863 of the laws of Hawaii, giving the form of the warrant:

Territory of Hawaii, island of ——, district of ——:

To ——, chief sheriff, or any constable or police officer of the district of ——, island of —— of ——, in the island of ——, having failed and neglected to pay the sum of —— dollars assessed upon him for personal taxes for the year ——, now due and unpaid, and no property being found belonging to the said —— whereon to levy by distress:

Therefore, by virtue of the authority in me vested by law, I hereby order and command you to forthwith arrest and take said —— before ——, district magistrate of ——, island of ——, to show cause, if any he has, why he, the said ——, should not be sentenced by said magistrate to be imprisoned at hard labor until he discharge the amount of said tax and costs as by law provided.

Hereof fail not, but of this order, with your proceedings thereon, make due return. Given under my hand this —— day of ——, A. D. ——.

——, ——,

Assessor of —— Division, Island of ——.

Then the law provides that a man shall be imprisoned at hard labor until that tax is worked out.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that left in force?

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is left in force.

Mr. CULLOM. Are you sure about that?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I can not find it in the list of repealed sections, and I have examined in order to find it.

Mr. CULLOM. We have a provision in this bill which repeals all laws in conflict with the bill we are considering.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I can not find that this law of Hawaii is repealed. I may be mistaken, but I can not find any such repeal, and I have been examining the matter very diligently.

Mr. HOAR. Before we pass from that, I should like to ask the Senator if he understands it was the intention to repeal that portion of the Hawaiian law, because I think if it should happen that there is any doubt about the matter, such a declaration as the Senator now makes would be very important.

Mr. CULLOM. The purpose of the commission, in the first place, and then of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, and it certainly has been my purpose, was to repeal all provisions of the Hawaiian law which imprisoned any man for debt, whatever the character of the debt might be.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There is no doubt but what that law is left in existence, so far as I can see.

Mr. CULLOM. If I may be allowed now, I want to go on. I believe I have got through with section 80.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have made a very careful examination of the bill and the chapters of the law on pages 3, 4, 5, and 6, where you have repealed certain of the Hawaiian statutes, and I do not find that these two are repealed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I can not find them.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose the provisions of the bill repeal them.

Mr. SPOONER. What provisions?

Mr. TILLMAN. What provision of the bill could possibly repeal them? This is a legal process for collecting taxes. It is not an imprisonment for debt, although it actually amounts to that.

Mr. CULLOM. I have not had time to look up the statutes to see exactly as to that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not been able to find it in the section of the bill in which those two sections of the Hawaiian law have been repealed.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that.

In section 81 the House inserted the words "circuit courts" in addition to the supreme court, struck out the provision in regard to bills of exceptions, etc., and added at the end of the section the following:

And until the legislature shall otherwise provide, the laws of Hawaii heretofore in force concerning the several courts and their jurisdiction and procedure shall continue in force except as herein otherwise provided.

That section, perhaps, would be better understood if I should read it. There is nothing in section 81, however, except to restore the words "circuit courts" in the section. The Senate, I believe, had only provided that the President should appoint the judges of the supreme court. The House provided that the President should appoint both the supreme court and circuit court judges, and in conference the Senate conferees consented to the President appointing the circuit judges as well as the supreme court judges, and the conferees agreed accordingly on the section.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Is that section 80?

Mr. CULLOM. No; section 81.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me, does that section leave in all cases the decisions of the supreme court of the Territory final, without any right of appeal in any case to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. CULLOM. I think the section did not apply to that.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; it did. There was a provision in the Senate bill for an appeal from the supreme court of Hawaii to the circuit court of appeals of the Ninth judicial circuit, and an appeal on writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States upon any writ of habeas corpus involving a question of personal freedom. Is that all stricken out of the bill?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. From where was the Senator reading?

Mr. SPOONER. I was reading from page 43, section 81, of the print of April 19.

Mr. CULLOM. I think, if the Senate will allow me to go on until we get entirely through with the court business. Senators will probably be better able to understand what is in and what is out of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I wanted to ask the Senator a question about something that has been passed; but if the Senator prefers to conclude before I ask the question, I shall wait.

Mr. CULLOM. I am getting a little tired of standing so long.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There are some questions that I want to ask the Senator, but I will ask them after he gets rested.

Mr. CULLOM. In section 81, as I stated, the House inserted a provision that—

The laws of Hawaii heretofore in force concerning the several courts and their jurisdiction and procedure shall continue in force except as herein otherwise provided.

Section 82 is amended so as to require that the judges of the supreme court shall be citizens of the Territory of Hawaii; that they shall be appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, and they may be removed by the President.

Section 83 is amended by the insertion, in line 21, on page 44, of the word "male," and also the words "and 21 years of age" are inserted; so as to make the provision that no person shall be a qualified juror unless he is a male citizen of the United States and 21 years of age, etc.

In line 24 there is an amendment which provides that "no person shall be convicted in any criminal case except by unanimous verdict of the jury."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Where is that?

Mr. CULLOM. In section 83. That, of course, is making the law conform to the laws of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. It will be found in lines 1 and 2, on page 45 of the last print.

Mr. CULLOM. I will say that the laws of the Territory allowed a verdict by two-thirds of the jury, I think, instead of unanimously.

On page 45 of the Senate bill there is an amendment referring to grand jurors which was agreed to by the conferees, is now in the conference bill, and included in the last part of section 83.

There is no amendment to section 84 of the Senate bill.

Referring to the Delegate in Congress, section 85 of the Senate bill is amended so as to require that the Delegate shall possess the qualifications necessary for membership of the house of representatives of the legislature of Hawaii, and he is also to have a seat in the House of Representatives with the right to debate, but not to vote, the same as a Delegate from any of the other Territories who comes to Congress.

Section 86 was amended by the House, but the amendment was receded from in conference, and the section stands in the conference bill as it was passed by the Senate.

Sections 87, 88, 89, and 90 were not changed.

Section 91 was amended by the House, and the conferees agreed to the amendment, the purport of which is that all moneys in the Hawaiian treasury, all the revenues and other property acquired by the government of Hawaii since the cession, shall be and remain the property of the Territory of Hawaii.

Section 92 provides for the salaries of certain officers appointed by the President, namely, the governor, $5,000, and so on, giving the salaries of the respective officers provided for in the bill.

As to the chief justice, I have forgotten whether the Senate bill provided for a salary of $5,500 or $5,000, but I think it was only $5,000. That is increased to $5,500. The salary of the associate justices is $5,000 each and that of the secretary of the Territory $3,000.

Section 92, providing for the payment of salaries to the governor, the secretary, the chief justice, and the associate justices, is amended as I have stated.

The House provided for the salaries of the circuit judges to be paid by the Territory of Hawaii, but as we finally agreed that those judges should be appointed by the President, the conferees report the bill providing that they shall be paid their salaries by the Government of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. They are Territorial judges?

Mr. BATE. Territorial circuit judges.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Is that the practice in the Territories of the United States?

Mr. CULLOM. I think we pay all the officers in our Territories where we provide for their appointment by the President. In such cases I think they are paid from the United States Treasury.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. These are simply temporary appointments until such time as the local government there shall be able to administer affairs in its own way, is it not?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir; the President is to continue to appoint the judges.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The President is to continue to appoint all of them?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I understand we are compelled, under the conference report, if adopted, and if the bill becomes a law, to select all of these officers from citizens of Hawaii, and we are given the great privilege of paying them their salaries out of our own Treasury. Why does not Hawaii support her own government?

Mr. CULLOM. That is what the commission started in to require them to do; but under the direction in part of Congress, as it has been manifested here, the judges are all to be appointed by the President; and if they are appointed by the President, I think their salaries ought to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, as is the case with all of our other Territories.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why not let the President select them, just as he does for all other Territories—wherever he can find the best talent?

Mr. CULLOM. That is a question I do not care to discuss any further now.

The section as reported by the conference also provides for the salary of the United States district judge at $5,000; the United States marshal, two thousand five hundred; United States district attorney, three thousand. And the governor shall receive annually, in addition to his salary, the sum of $500 for stationery, postage, and incidentals, and also his traveling expenses while absent from the capitol on official business, and the sum of $2,000 annually for his private secretary.

Section 93 of the Senate bill was not amended.

Section 94 refers to the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, requiring a report, etc., the House striking out the last four lines, beginning after the word "fit," on page 51, line 18, of the Senate bill, being an appropriation of $5,000 for the purpose of examining into the subject of fisheries surrounding that Territory.

Section 95 remains in the bill reported by the conferees as it passed the Senate.

Section 96 was amended by the House striking out "shall" and inserting "may," and inserting "such" between "in" and "manner," and inserting after the word "manner" the words "as may be." The intention was to make it read more smoothly, as the conferees thought.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What section is that?

Mr. CULLOM. Section 96.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Some of these prints have no section 96 in them.

Mr. CULLOM. You have got hold of the wrong bill, I reckon.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have both.

Mr. CULLOM. It will now read as follows:

That if such fishing right be established, the attorney-general of the Territory of Hawaii may proceed, in such manner as may be provided by law, etc.

Section 97 was amended by striking out all the latter portion of the section, requiring the United States to pay in part all the expenses of the leper settlement on the island of Molokai and the leper hospital at Kalihi, and the homes at which the children of lepers are received, etc,

The people of the Territory, so far as I could learn, prefer to pay the expenses of those settlements, and I thought it better to allow them to do so, and so did the conferees and the commission.

Section 98 was amended by the House striking out "on the 12th day of August" and inserting "permanent or temporary, on August 12," and also inserting the words "together with the following-named vessels claiming Hawaiian register." That refers to the registration of a certain number of vessels which were incorporated in the bill, which are named and the names of which I presented to the Senate when we considered the bill; but there seemed to be some confusion as to what ought to go in, and I asked to withdraw the amendment, and it was done. The House put it in and the conferees agreed to it.

Mr. BACON. In this connectton the Senator will remember that that was a provision which elicited considerable debate in the Senate, and after that debate it was the judgment of the Senate that the ships should not be named as entitled to registration. In other words, the judgment of the Senate was that the question of registration should be determined by the class to which a vessel belonged, and it should not be designated and taken out of a class and given this special favor. The judgment of the Senate was that the registration of those vessels should be limited to those which at a certain date were in the class named.

Now, what I desire to ask the Senator is this: The Senator, of course, is familiar with the reasons which were given in the Senate why the designation of particular ships as entitled to registration was not favored by the Senate and why the Senate decided against it; and in order that I may be informed as to whether the change should be made, I should like the Senator to inform us as to the reasons——

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator does not recollect the exact facts with reference to the matter as it occurred in the Senate. I myself introduced the amendment.

Mr. BACON. Yes; I remember.

Mr. CULLOM. It was given to me by a Senator, I think, and I supposed there would be no objection to it. I introduced it in the Senate, and we had scarcely began to consider it before, I think, my distinguished friend the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] proposed to insert the names of a large number of vessels about which nobody seemed to know anything except, perhaps, the Senator himself. Rather than delay and indulge in a long discussion about it I withdrew the amendment. That is the literal truth about it. The Senate really did not consider this subject, except for a very few moments.

Mr. BACON. Is the Senator prepared to state now—my recollection having been refreshed—why these vessels named, which are admitted by this amendment to registration, should be admitted rather than other vessels?

Mr. CULLOM. The only reason I know is that as to these particular vessels everyone said that while there was a little question about their being legally registered in Hawaii, because of the change of government in the meantime, yet they were in fact entitled to registration, provided the government over there had had such an existence as to give registration at all; and so far as I was concerned as one of the conferees I allowed the provision to go in as it is reported.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator from Illinois made a remark a few moments ago, saying I wanted to add the names of a lot of other vessels.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the Senator did have a list of eight or ten, he said.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I objected to adding the names of any vessels, and I read a list of those which had received Hawaiian register since our flag went up. I protested against adding the names of any ships, and the Senator decidedly misrepresents me by any such statement.

Mr. CULLOM. I certainly did not mean to do so, if the Senator objected.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I objected to any being put in.

Mr. CULLOM. I remember the Senator had a list of ten vessels.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I had a list from the records of Hawaii, showing that they had registered eight or ten ships, perhaps, after our flag went up there, as I believe, in violation of law, and I did not think it ought to be ratified by our act. It was a lawless act on their part, and it ought not to be ratified on our part. I objected to adding any names and giving registration in this manner. I want that distinctly understood.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not remember that the Senator made any objection, but thought that he wanted more ships added.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I did object to those that were in and to the adding of any more. A year ago I defeated a separate bill brought in here to give those ships a register by refusing to consent to its consideration. I do not believe this amendment ought to be ratified to give an American register to any such vessels.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course I do not desire to misrepresent the Senator from South Dakota. I was merely stating in his presence what my recollection was. If he says that he first objected to all of them, I withdraw it, of course.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not say I first objected to all of them. I say I objected at all times to all of them, and I simply read an additional list to show what they were doing over there.

Mr. CULLOM. I remember when the Senator began to read the long list I concluded to withdraw the amendment, and did so in order to get rid of the subject.

Mr. PETTIGREW. And they are all put back in conference?

Mr. CULLOM. The list of five are put back in conference.

Mr. PETTIGREW. So my protest, by showing an additional list, succeeded in knocking it out in the Senate and preventing a discussion of this question; and then they are put back in conference.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdrew the amendment without any reference to the question of the merits of the case, because I did not want at that time to delay the bill by a long discussion as to what vessels were entitled to registration and what were not.

Section 99 remains in the bill reported by the conferees substantially as in the Senate bill, except a different use of language meaning the same thing.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before we pass from section 99, I see there is an amendment here which limits or rather puts off for a year our coasting laws. Why is that?

Mr. CULLOM. That was put in in the House and withdrawn by the conferees.

Mr. TILLMAN. But it is in yet.

Mr. CULLOM. No; it is not. I have said to the Senator several times that the amendments of the conferees to the House bill are not in this print, because the Senators desired to see just what the difference was between the House and the Senate, and not between the Senate and the conferees.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have the wrong bill. It is pretty hard to keep these babies from getting mixed up. It is very difficult to tell what is the conference report and what was passed by the House.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator would follow it closely he would find out.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am trying to follow it closely.

Mr. CULLOM. Section 101 was amended by the insertion of an amendment providing that "all Chinese and other Asiatics who came or were brought into Hawaii since August 12, 1898, under contract, etc., shall depart therefrom and from the United States within one year from the date of the taking effect of this act." That amendment was stricken out down to the proviso after the word "acts," in the last part of the paragraph, and the balance of the section remains in the bill reported by the conferees.

Sections 101 and 102 were not amended by the House.

One hundred and four, the last section of the bill, was amended by striking out "thirty" and inserting "sixty" by the House, but the conferees struck out "sixty" and inserted "forty-five." In the second line of the section as appears in the conference bill the words "excepting only as to section 52, relating to appropriations, which shall take effect upon such approval," were inserted and agreed to by the conferees. There was a mistake in the first conference report. It referred to a section of the bill as 53 when it ought to have been 52. That is all there was of that.

Mr. President, I desire to make a few general remarks, and then I propose to take my seat.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me before he begins the general discussion, I was unavoidably out of the Chamber when one amendment was passed about which I wished to ask some questions. It may have been stated by the Senator, but I notice that there is an amendment here by which Hawaii is made a separate district and attached to the Ninth judicial circuit.

Mr. CULLOM. That is the bill verbatim et literatim as it passed the Senate, I think.

Mr. BACON. It is in italics here.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, but it is——

Mr. BACON. If I recollect aright, the Senator from Wisconsin succeeded when that was before the Senate in having it changed. The Senator from Wisconsin took the position and argued it with great earnestness upon authority that it would be an unconstitutional court; that we had no right to establish a constitutional court outside of the organized territory of States.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will remember that after quite a discussion by himself and several other Senators, the provision as it was in the original Senate bill was amended so as to make it a legislative court in the estimation of the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Colorado and the Senator himself, as well as the Senator from Connecticut. The House bill had the original provision in it as it was reported to the Senate, and it passed in that way, but the conferees insisted upon restoring the provision as it passed the Senate of the United States, and that was done.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was misled by the printed copy of the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand.

Mr. BACON. I supposed that was the status of the bill, but the statement of the Senator, of course, shows I am in error.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will find by looking at the conference report that the Senate provision was restored.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will see how it was that I made the mistake.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I got hold of the wrong copy.

Mr. CULLOM. It only verifies what has been often stated, that the action of the House in striking out all of the Senate bill in the first place makes it very embarrassing and difficult for any Senator to follow it.

Mr. President, I should be unfaithful to my conception of duty if I should fail to give to the Senate of the United States my views in regard to the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands.

The incorporation of these provinces of the sea into our political system, under the provisions of this bill, is the final great step taken in fulfillment of our duty in extending the salutary influences of the American Republic over a people who have for years offered to us a standing invitation to take them under our control.

It is true, Mr. President, that the events of a score of years have tended toward this result, as a culmination which was certain to come and which has been constantly foreseen. It is true, also, Mr. President, that the nations and peoples which have inhabited or controlled in large degree the oceanic provinces in both the Atlantic and Pacific have, by the logic of the situation, become rivals for the control and ownership of the wonderful commerce of this portion of the semitropical world. This rivalry has been a matter of growth, and not of choice, with the United States. The extent and the ramification of this rivalry came naturally and logically, and it was not initiated by the United States, as in a race for territory or for spoils. We all remember when the eyes of the civilized world were directed to the movements of the Oregon in her memorable trip half around the world. We all remember Santiago and San Juan, and we quickly recall Manila, and the rest, where the fortunes of war gave victory to our arms.

But, Mr. President, we have acquired Hawaii in the peaceful and proper way, as the logical and certain conclusion of great principles which underlie our civilization, our growth. In the early days of the century the American spirit of expansion carried our ships and our commerce and our whalers and our missionaries, as explorers and advance agents of civilization, into the far Pacific, and established agencies for the humanizing of the native peoples. Now they are coming back to us, bringing golden rewards to their mother country. They come back to us with a wealth of education and prosperity and intelligence and ask us confidently to be allowed to join us as citizens of the United States. They do not come as beggars or paupers, but as a people who have not buried their talents in a napkin.

Mr. President, what do they bring? What have they got? What will the United States realize as the return for the extension of sovereignty over Hawaii?

As preliminary to a general answer to these queries, I wish to allude to the visible commerce on the part of Honolulu in December last past, the latest showing available. I learn from official and reliable sources that in December, 1899, the largest amount of imports ever recorded in a single month was received. Sixteen foreign steamers and 48 sailing vessels arrived with cargoes. This did not include the large number of United States transports laden with stock or with quartermaster supplies. There were 40 general cargoes, with a total of 45,000 tons; 11 cargoes of coal, with 23,000 tons, and 13 lumber vessels, carrying nearly 10,000,000 feet of lumber. The revenue from import duties alone in 1899 was $400,000 in excess of that of 1898.

This little statement shows in some degree what is now following the evolution of the policy of expansion as applied only to the Hawaiian Islands in part.

I append here a few extracts from the report of the collector-general of customs for the year 1899. These show an aggregate commerce in that year amounting to nearly $42,000,000. Of this amount, over $19,000,000 was imported from the United States and twenty-two and one-half millions exported to the United States.

The value of the exports show an increase in 1899 over 1898 of five and one-half million dollars in value.

COMMERCE OF HAWAII.

I take from the report of the collector-general of customs of Honolulu for the year ended December 31, 1899, the following figures:

Twenty-nine articles of export.

Mr. Sewall, United States special agent at Honolulu, incloses a clipping from a local paper, which says, in part:

During the month of December, 1899, the largest amount of imports ever recorded for one month in Honolulu was received.

Sixteen foreign steamers and 48 sailing vessels arrived in port with cargoes. This does not include the large number of United States transports that entered the harbor bringing stock and quartermaster supplies.

There were 40 general cargoes, amounting to a total of 45,000 tons; 11 cargoes of coal, the total being 22,850 tons; and 13 vessels brought in lumber with a total of 9,198,530 feet.

The acquisition of these islands by the United States has given an impetus to Honolulu that has attracted the commercial interest of the world. The carrying and shipping to this port has grown with such rapidity that the increase of trade in December, 1899, compared with December of a year ago, is something phenomenal.

In evidence of the prosperity of the port, a walk along the water front will show every available dock and berth occupied by vessels unloading cargoes of every description, and a large number anchored in the stream compelled to wait for days before being able to discharge, on account of the small accommodations.

The revenue from import duties in 1899, adds Mr. Sewall, was $400,000 in excess of that of 1898.

The second column in the tables of "Trade by articles" gives the increases in both imports and exports of Hawaii for 1899 over 1898, which reach nearly all of the articles of trade.

It must be remembered that the duties collected upon this commerce have all gone into the Hawaiian treasury. So it has been with all moneys accumulating in the Hawaiian postal service up to this time. But both the customs and the postal receipts will, after the passage of this bill, come to the United States Treasury.

Now let us look a little at the geographical situation of Hawaii as related to other parts of the world, and especially to this country. I quote from the reports of the Hawaiian commission made to the President and published by the Fifty-fifth Congress:

The Hawaiian Islands are located in the Pacific Ocean, about 2,100 miles southwest from San Francisco, and are between 18° and 23° north latitude and 154° and 161° west longitude. The latitude or distance from the equator is about the same as that of Cuba. The climate would probably be the same as that of Cuba were it not modified and equalized by the northeast trade winds, which prevail for about nine months of the year, coming over thousands of miles of ocean uncontaminated by impurities. The Japanese gulf stream is a broad current of cool water, flowing like a river across the Pacific Ocean, which lowers the temperature within its vicinity materially.

There are other somewhat permanent currents and winds which affect temperature, and these great natural agencies tend constantly to neutralize the tropical heat, which would otherwise seriously affect the temperature of the islands. The annual average of temperature at Honolulu is 72° or 73° F., while the lowest is 55° and the highest 88°. During the warmest month of the year, September, the temperature, except for about two hours at midday, stands at about 78°. There is never any frost or snow, except upon the high mountain peaks, where at the altitude of nearly 14,000 feet there are at times considerable snowfalls.

AREA AND POPULATION.

The Hawaiian group numbers seven inhabited islands and eleven or twelve small rocky or sandy shoals or reefs, with a total area of 6,740 square miles. They are described as follows:

	Population, 1896.
Hawaii, area 4,210 square miles	33,285
Maui, 760 square miles	17,726
Oahu, 600 square miles	40,205
Kauai, 590 square miles (rich farming and grazing lands)	15,228
Molokai, 270 square miles (agricultural and grazing)	2,307
Lanai, 150 square miles (devoted to sheep raising)	105
Niihau, 97 square miles (leased to sheep raisers)	164

Kahoolawe, 63 square miles.
Molokini, small size.
Lehua, small size.
Nihoa, 500 acres (about), precipitous rock, 400 feet high (244 miles northwest from Honolulu).
Layasn, 2,000 acres (about), guano island, low and sandy, 30 feet high (800 miles northwest from Honolulu).
Gardeners Island, two inaccessible rocks, 200 feet high, about 1,000 feet long (667 miles northwest of Honolulu).
Liscansky Island, 500 acres (about), low and sandy, 25 to 50 feet high (920 miles northwest from Honolulu).
Ocean Island, 500 acres (about), low and sandy (1,800 miles northwest from Honolulu).
Necker Island, 400 acres (about), a precipitous rock, 300 feet high (400 miles northwest from Honolulu).
Palmyra Island, a cluster of low islets, about 10 miles in circumference, with lagoon in center; has a few cocoanut trees (1,100 miles southwest of Honolulu).
Kaula, small, rocky island, a few miles southwest of Niihau.
French Frigate Shoal, scattered shoals or reefs.

THE INHABITANTS.

An important subject of our investigation was that of the adaptability of the several races of the people who inhabit the islands for American citizenship and their ability to sustain the obligations which attach to the right of suffrage. The American idea of universal suffrage presupposes that the body of citizens who are to exercise it in a free and independent manner have, by inheritance or education, such knowledge and appreciation of the responsibilities of free suffrage and of a full participation in the sovereignty of the country as to be able to maintain a republican government.

The following different races and nationalities of people now occupy the Hawaiian Islands:

Hawaiians and mixed blood	39,000
Japanese	25,000
Chinese	21,500
Portuguese	15,000
Americans	4,000
British	2,250
Germans and other Europeans	2,000
Polynesians and miscellaneous	1,250
Total	110,000

The native Hawaiians are a kindly, affectionate people, confiding, friendly, and liberal, many of them childlike and easy in habits and manners, willing to associate and intermarry with the European or other races, obedient to law and governmental authority. Many of the Japanese are contract laborers, who are engaged upon the sugar plantations. Others are employed as day laborers. There are some, however, who have become merchants and mechanics, who conduct business for themselves, and who exhibit the national characteristics of skill, thrift, and ability.

There are about 700 Chinese who have been naturalized into the Hawaiian republic. Many of the Chinese and Japanese on the islands are, or have been, brought there under permits by that government, and contracts under which they are bound to work for a term of years, and to return at the expiration of the contract term of service. At the expiration of their terms they are either returned to their native country, or renew their labor contracts, or become day laborers.

Nearly all Chinese laborers desire and expect to go back to China at death, if not before. The Japanese are not so particular as to returning; but with their accumulative habits they frequently attain a position and standing in business which makes it desirable to them to remain in the islands.

The Americans, although in such a small minority, practically dominate the governmental affairs of the country, and, with the British and Germans, and part-blood Hawaiian-Americans together, constitute the controlling element in business. The Chinese and Japanese do not now possess political power, nor have they any important relation to the body politic, except as laborers. The Portuguese are largely immigrants from the islands and colonies of Portugal in the Atlantic, and have never been very closely tied to their mother country. With the certain attrition which is bound to exist between them and the Americans in Hawaii, and under the influence of the existing public-school system, which makes the study of the English language compulsory, they promise to become a good class of people for the growth of republican ideas.

It will, of course, be observed that this entire population of 110,000 is dominated, politically, financially, and commercially, by the American element.

HAWAII.

Hawaii, the largest of the islands and from which the group takes its name, contains nearly 2,500,000 acres of land, and has a population of nearly 34,000. Its principal town is Hilo, situated on Hilo Bay, at the mouth of the Wailuku River. Hilo possesses several churches, a good hotel, and several business houses. There are three lofty mountains on the island of Hawaii, viz, Mauna Kea, Mauna Loa, and Hualalai. The two first are nearly 14,000 feet high and the other 8,000. Upon Mauna Loa are two great volcanoes, Kilauea, upon the side of the mountain, at an elevation of 4,000 feet, and the other, Mokuaweoweo, at the top, or at about 13,500 feet elevation. These two great volcanoes are still alive, but not now in eruption.

We visited Kilauea and crossed its broad lava fields within the walls of its original crater, and now about 500 feet below the rim or edge of the wall. On the southerly portion of this broad lava bed is a still deeper pit, or live crater, apparently some 800 feet below the surface of the broad lava field before mentioned, from the very bottom of which arises a whitish sulphurous smoke so dense as to hide from full view the surface of the burning, seething liquid far below. This is what is called "Halemauman," "the house of fire," when the volcano is active and in eruption, but it is now very quiet and smoky. Yet even now numerous crevices are found, some of them 2 or 3 miles from this pit or lake, from which smoke or steam constantly arises, and in which sticks thrust down a few inches by us readily took fire. Around some of these crevices an efflorescence of sulphur was noticed, and on examination we found deposits of pure native sulphur so hot from the subterranean fountain, perhaps 3 miles away, that it could not be handled. It must be remembered that this description refers only to Kilauea, and not at all to the great volcano itself at the top of the mountain, and called "Mokuaweoweo," which during the ages and ages past has poured the lava over the island many times.

The magnitude of this mountain is hardly believed at first sight, but the distance is not less than 60 miles from the base on one side to the other. And from the crater of Kilauea, on the side of Mauna Loa, to the crater of Mokuaweoweo, at the top of the same mountain, is about 25 miles. The side slopes of these great mountains comprise practically all the agricultural land upon this island. This can nearly all be cultivated after it is cleared from its luxuriant vegetation. Some of it, however, has such a rank growth of tree ferns, wild bananas, and all sorts of tropical trees and vines as to require a cost of from $30 to $60 per acre to clear it. There are great fields of sugar cane on this island, the best of which yields under favorable conditions from 5 to 6 or more tons of sugar per acre.

MAUI.

Maui is believed to be one of the oldest volcanic islands. Much of the lava of which it is composed has become decomposed and available for easy cultivation, while the use of artesian water for irrigation has made the sugar lands the most profitable known. This island has upon it the great volcano of Haleakala, now and for centuries entirely quiet, but which is the largest extinct volcano in the world. This crater is half a mile deep and 20 miles in circumference.

On this island artesian water is pumped in quantities of 6,000,000 gallons daily to the height of 400 feet, for sugar irrigation. The lands on the south and west sides of the island are mostly cattle ranches and pasture lands, while on the north and east the numerous streams furnish abundance of water for prosperous plantations of sugar and coffee. This island was once a kingdom. The town of Lahaina was its capital and contained the palaces of the king. Some of the plantations on this island were visited by us and were truly places of beauty. They evidenced great enterprise, and yield large profits from the great crops of sugar.

KAUAI.

Kauai, the most northwesterly of the group, is nearly circular in form and about 25 miles in diameter, having an area of about 590 square miles. It is believed to be one of the oldest of the Hawaiian Islands; has a deeper soil and a greater proportion of naturally arable land. It seems to have been originally formed by eruptions of Mount Waialeale, the great central peak 6,000 feet in height, a volcano which has been extinct from time immemorial. There are several mountain streams flowing from an elevated natural reservoir, or lake, in the central plateau.

The valleys between the mountain ranges, which radiate from the interior, are broad and deep, having large areas of rich bottom lands, very productive under the influence of irrigation, which is largely in use for the sugar plantations. Kauai was, in the remote past, a kingdom by itself, and the stories of kings and chiefs and warriors of Kauai are the traditional histories of the island. Lihue, the chief settlement, has about 3,500 inhabitants. The Falls of Wailua are romantically situated in the midst of a luxuriant forest, the river falling 180 feet in one unbroken sheet. Coffee, sugar, rice, and some other products are grown with profit. The inhabitants of Kauai take much pride in their fertile lands.

OAHU.

Oahu, upon which is situated Honolulu, the capital city, is the most populous of the islands, having over 40,000 inhabitants. It is devoted largely to pasturage and agriculture. Several very profitable sugar plantations are now operated on this island, and the full development of the artesian water supply for the irrigation of growing sugar cane is here exhibited. During the past two years the yield of sugar upon one of the favorably situated plantations has exceeded expectation, amounting to from 9½ to 10½ tons of sugar per acre. Honolulu Harbor, although not large enough to accommodate a rapidly growing commerce, is a deep-water opening through the coral reefs at the mouth of the Nuuanu Valley, in front of the city of Honolulu.

PEARL HARBOR.

A few miles away is Pearl Harbor, a naturally excavated harbor, covering 8 or 10 square miles of water surface and ranging from 20 to 90 feet deep.

It is expected that by a small appropriation a coral reef, which bars the entrance from the ocean for large vessels, will be removed by the Government of the United States, whereupon this will furnish the best harbor on the Pacific. Some of the most beautiful and enchanting residence sites to be found are at Honolulu. A railway 55 miles in length connects Honolulu with Waialua and several intervening points. Several very prosperous business enterprises are established at Honolulu, and, altogether, the location, for many reasons, is a most desirable one for commercial and shipping facilities.

MOLOKAI.

Molokai is a long, narrow island, about 40 miles in length and less than 10 miles in width. The eastern half of Molokai has some very wild mountain scenery and in some places a luxuriant vegetation. Recently much attention has been given to irrigation from artesian water, and a large area is expected soon to be brought under profitable culture. Still, most of the island is devoted to pasturage. Quite a large number of deer have their haunts on this island.

NIIHAU.

Niihau is an island of nearly 100 square miles, the most of the land upon which has been leased to sheep raisers. There are about 100 native inhabitants, who adhere in manners and style of living to the customs of their earlier ancestors. The handiwork of the natives in the making of a kind of mats is known all over the islands. They are called "Niihau mats," and bring large prices from the collectors of curios. A part of this island consists of a coral reef, uplifted by some convulsion of nature, but now largely covered by volcanic material washed down from the mountains.

LANAI.

Lanai comprises about 100,000 acres, devoted almost wholly to sheep raising and the production of wool. It has only about 100 inhabitants, and is rarely visited except by persons interested in the sheep-raising or wool-growing industry.

RAINFALL.

There is a great diversity in the amount of rainfall in different localities, but it is thought that about 50 inches per annum is the average over the group. On the windward (northeast) side of some of the islands at certain low altitudes the rainfall reaches 150 inches, as at Hilo, or even 200 inches, as at the volcano of Kilauea, while on the leeward side, at the sea level, very little rain falls, but up the mountain sides there is usually abundant moisture. The climate is particularly healthy, both in the dry or wet localities, it being claimed even that the frequent showers in some places do not saturate the air with moisture. There is very seldom much humidity in the atmosphere, and even in damp or marshy districts there is seldom any malaria or fever germs.

Temperature and rainfall at Honolulu for the twelve months from July, 1896, to June, 1897, inclusive.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH.

The Hawaiian government has devoted its most earnest efforts to the protection of the inhabitants against the introduction of dangerous contagious and infectious diseases, and a strict quarantine is maintained at points where ships from infected ports might call.

The board of health is one of the most important agencies in the islands for the preservation and promotion of the public health, and is given almost plenary powers under the law. Ordinary malarial fevers are quite rare. There are, however, occasional cases of typhoid fever, especially among the United States troops recently stationed at Honolulu. There have been occasional epidemics of various diseases at times during the past one hundred years.

Under present health regulations, with the experience gained, the government can, it is thought, cope with epidemic diseases better than that of almost any other country.

Live stock, including cattle, sheep, and swine, are raised to some extent. It is stated that the value of live stock produced ranks third in amount of all the agricultural products of the islands.

THE PRISON SYSTEM.

The Hawaiian Islands maintain a prison system, the principal penal institution corresponding to the State prisons of the various States of the Union, while on each of the larger islands a prison for the use of their respective local offenders is provided. In addition there is in each district a lockup or detention calaboose, in some of which are detained small gangs held for minor offenses and sentenced for short terms to perform street or road labor. Where possible the plan of placing but one prisoner to a cell is adhered to. The Honolulu prison is under the charge of a jailor and several prison guards, the whole system subject to the supervision of the marshal of the islands, who is responsible to the board of prison inspectors appointed by the minister of the interior.

The foregoing gives briefly a description of the principal features of the country. It is now about eighteen months since the Stars and Stripes were formally raised over the country, and during that period, although the extension of the laws of the United States has been held in abeyance until the further action of Congress, yet the business of Hawaii has experienced the greatest prosperity, and every material interest of the people and the country has participated in the general welfare.

Mr. President, I am more than pleased that the labors of the Hawaiian Commission, in which I had the honor of participating, now bid fair to result in the establishment of Territorial government as a part of the United States. I am highly gratified to think that the new Territory of Hawaii, which has come to us willingly and peacefully in the progress of the nation's evolution, will doubtless stand as a bright monument marking almost the starting point of American expansion over the island provinces of the Pacific. No citizen of the United States need ever feel any doubt as to the intellectual, moral, or financial standing of the people who inhabit Hawaii. They bring to us a splendid educational system, a prosperous and profitable agricultural establishment, yielding large profits to the sugar planters and the coffee and rice growers.

Mr. President, it has been suggested to me and to the Senate that there are one or two provisions in the bill which are not satisfactory to the Senate. I do not know whether a majority of the Senate are for the provisions that have been controverted, but I desire to say that at the present moment the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], conferees on the bill, are absent. The Senator from Alabama, I understand, is ill. He has not been out for two or three days, at least. So if the bill should go back to the conferees, there could be nothing done with it until one or the other of the conferees of the Senate, both of whom are absent, can be secured to give attention to the subject.

Mr. HOAR. Put on other conferees.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Alabama is in town, but he has been ill for several days. The Senator from Massachusetts has been called to New York or somewhere East. I should like very much to get the report ratified and out of the way, but I want to be entirely fair and frank, as I think I have been in connection with the subject to-day in trying to uncover every fact connected with it, so that Senators would not be misled.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator a question, in view of his expressed desire that the report shall be ratified. In the bill as agreed upon by the conference committee, the fifth subdivision of section 60 reads as follows:

Fifth. Prior to such registration having paid, on or before the 31st day of March next preceding the date of registration, all taxes due by him to the government.

I wish to inquire of the Senator whether he agrees with the statement that if the conference report is agreed to and this becomes a law that that date, being fixed, necessarily will limit the persons who can be this year registered and this year participate in the election which will select the officers for this Territory to those who have heretofore been on the registration list, because the date has passed. That number, I understand, is less than 3,000. So, instead 14,000 men, which it was stated when the bill was in the Senate before would be the number of those who would be enfranchised and entitled to participate in this election, there will be less than 3,000. I want to ask the Senator if he recognizes the correctness of that, and if he does so recognize it, if he himself would personally favor the enactment of a bill into a law which would have that effect?

Mr. CULLOM. I would not.

Mr. BACON. Does not the Senator agree that that must necessarily be the effect of it?

Mr. CULLOM. I have been in doubt about it. I was going to suggest that I would ask the Senate to postpone the further consideration of the report to-day, so that I may learn whether the Senator from Alabama, one of the conferees, can be present to-morrow.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, the course which

I should like to have pursued is this: If the conference report can be disagreed to, the Senate could then accept the House amendment without more, which I believe is a proper amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator is mistaken, I think, as to the regular order.

Mr. BACON. Possibly.

Mr. CULLOM. The conference report, as I understand parliamentary law, must either be rejected as a whole or ratified or confirmed as a whole.

Mr. BACON. Certainly; the Senator is undoubtedly correct; but he does not understand what I said.

Mr. CULLOM. It is not in the power of the Senate to make any amendment to it, and naturally it would have to go back to the conferees.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is correct in part. We of course can not amend the conference report, but when we reject the conference report it is perfectly competent for the Senate to adopt the House amendment, which was in conference.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think not.

Mr. BACON. We are not obliged to send it back to the conference committee at all. We may accept the entire House amendment after that and agree to it.

Mr. SPOONER. We have to agree to it or reject it and send it back.

Mr. BACON. Rejecting it is not sending it back; it is failing to agree to it.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to hear the Presiding Officer on that point.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The matter in disagreement between the Senate and the House is upon one amendment of the House, which is an entire bill. That is what is in disagreement between the Senate and the House. It is the Senate bill as it left the Senate; it is the House amendment as the House adopted it; and that is one amendment, and covers the whole ground.

Mr. BACON. I admit that the Senator from Connecticut is correct. That view of it had not suggested itself to me.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Now, one other word. If we reject it, we are at liberty then, I think, though I am not sure about that, to accept the entire House amendment, but we can not change it in one particular.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is wrong in that, I respectfully submit. Whenever a bill passes the Senate and goes to the House and comes back to the Senate with an amendment, while we can not amend any part of the bill which we sent to them, we can amend any of their amendments, and we could amend the entire bill, which is an amendment, in any one particular that we saw proper, upon the general proposition that we can always amend an amendment of the House. Of course that would presuppose the fact that the conference committee reports the other way.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is true, until the matter has gone to a conference. This has been to a conference. It comes back here. The question and the only question is, Will the Senate agree to the report of the conference committee? Then, as I understand it, the only question after that is whether we will agree to the entire amendment of the House, or whether we will insist upon our disagreement and send the entire amendment back to the conference committee. I have never understood that we could, after rejecting the report of a conference committee, proceed to make amendments to the House amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Connecticut if we can not recede now from our disagreement to the House amendment?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. Or disagree to the amendment of the House and agree to it with an amendment?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think not, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. I supposed we could.

Mr. BACON. Oh, yes; undoubtedly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The conference report is still in our possession. I think we can.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not think so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. I began to state that I myself was inclined to postpone the further consideration of the conference report to-day, so that the conferees on the part of the Senate might have time to consult. If the conference report is likely to be rejected, I would rather withdraw it and make such amendments to it by another conference as would be necessary to fairly satisfy the Senate, if we could do it.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest to the Senator whether he can withdraw it?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know whether I can or not. If I can not, there is only one thing to do, and that is to agree to it or reject it.

Mr. TELLER. We can dispose of it either by accepting it or rejecting it. If we want a further conference, we will reject it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It seems to me also that this matter can only go back to a conference by the action of the Senate. The conferees have met, the report is made and signed, and it can not go back to conference except by order of the Senate. Besides, the conferees ought to have the action of the Senate when they go into conference again to show the state of mind of the Senate, the objections that are made to the different amendments, and the reasons why the Senate will not agree to the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, it seems to me, if the Senate consents, that I have a right to ask that the report be postponed for the time being.

Mr. TELLER. What is the use of postponing it?

Mr. CULLOM. Because I want to consult the other conferees before taking action.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator's consultation amount to anything if he has not the power to change it, and can not change it until he gets it out of the Senate?

Mr. CULLOM. Of course we may consent to take the vote and let the report be agreed to or rejected. But I do not think it is exactly fair to press a disposition of it at this moment unless I consent to it.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me we might just as well dispose of it. I do not think under the parliamentary law the Senator can gain anything by taking a recess and consulting his colleagues on the conference committee. We must either accept the report or reject it. Now, if we are ready, if debate has gone on as far as it need to go, why not vote on it? I do not know whether any Senator desires to speak on it further, but I will say to the Senator I do not believe the Senate is very likely to accept the report with that provision in it. The Senator himself says that he does not think it ought to be in there.

Mr. CULLOM. I agree——

Mr. TELLER. He says that it may have been an oversight on the part of the conference committee. The orderly way is for us to reject the report and let the Senator take it back into conference. There may be other things in it that are objectionable. I do not know whether other Senators may not have other objections, but that is certainly a fatal objection.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I want to call attention to another objection.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply made the suggestion in perfect good faith that I should like to have the report go over for to day so that I could consult with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who is interested in it and who is present in town, but not able to be here to-day. I think it is not unreasonable for me to ask that privilege.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I see no reason why the Senator from Illinois should not be gratified in this matter.

Mr. CULLOM. I have been perfectly square with the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The report is in the hands of the Senate. The Senate can do with it what it chooses.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator from Illinois wants the report to go over to another day for consideration or for any reason, he has charge of it, and it seems to me perfectly reasonable that he should have his request complied with.

Mr. CULLOM. I want to make one more remark before it goes over, if it does, and that is that since I sat down I have this note, which answers the first question that was made:

> All the subjects of the monarchy were made citizens of the republic by express provision of the constitution of the republic. Those who wished to vote under the republic were required to take the oath.

Mr. BACON. That is all right, then.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish, if this matter is to go over, that the Senator from Illinois, who is more familiar with this subject than I am and than most of us are, would give attention to the question whether under the bill as it would stand if it passes the law of Hawaii punishing a man by imprisonment and hard labor for failing to pay his poll tax would remain in force.

Mr. CULLOM. I shall certainly do so.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is a special objection.

Mr. SPOONER. I myself would not vote for any such provision.

Mr. TILLMAN. Sections 863 and 864 of the Hawaiian code are the points we want absolute certainty on, as to whether those statutes are repealed or not.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the provision on page 9. We provide with regard to contract laborers—

> That no suit or proceedings shall be maintained for the specific performance of any contract heretofore or hereafter entered into for personal labor or service, nor shall any remedy exist or be enforced for breach of any such contract, except in a civil suit or proceeding instituted solely to recover damages for such breach.

Then we provide further—

That the provisions of this section shall not apply to merchant seamen.

Mr. SPOONER. That was not in the Senate bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Where is the Senator reading?

Mr. PETTIGREW. On page 9 of the last print.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Of what print—the 19th?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes; the print of the 19th of April. I do not know whether they have a law with regard to seamen or not in Hawaii. I have looked at the code or this print of the laws of Hawaii, and I can not find it, but I have had only a brief time to examine it. However, under our law the Supreme Court have held that seamen can be imprisoned and returned to the ship and compelled to complete their contract. But in 1890 we amended the law so that the provisions with regard to enforced service did not apply to seamen who had contracted for service in the domestic trade, the coast trade.

Now, it seems to me that we ought not to do more in Hawaii than extend the provisions of our own laws. I do not believe that in the foreign service a man should be compelled to finish his contract if he did not want to do it. I think there should be some other remedy besides enforced service. But I do object to extending to Hawaii the provisions of any law that are more stringent than ours. Therefore I am desirous of knowing whether they have a law with regard to enforcing contracts with seamen for service, and what it is, and where it is.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not care to take up time now in discussing the bill any further, except to say that one of my reasons for asking for the postponement of the consideration of the report until to-morrow, or some other day, is for the purpose of seeing in the RECORD the exact points of criticism of the bill, so that if it has to go back to conference we will know what has been said about it and be more ready to dispose of it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I want to say that the Senator, in going over the bill in a hasty sort of way, referring to sections and saying they had been or had not been amended, etc., a number of times saying to the Senate that he was fatigued and intimating he did not want to be interrupted, has prevented a number of us from asking questions and getting an explanation about matters in the conference report that are not satisfactory to me as they are now. I regret that all these provisions have not been gone over and understood. I should like to ask the Senator one question that I wanted to ask while he was going through with the report; and that is the parliamentary condition as to two lines on page 42 of the print of the 19th, lines 8 and 9, that—

All officers appointed under the provisions of this section shall be citizens of the Territory of Hawaii.

This print is in italics in the print of the 19th, and, as I understand, that was agreed to in the conference; it was proposed as an amendment in conference.

Mr. CULLOM. On page 44?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. On page 42, lines 8 and 9.

Mr. CULLOM. "All persons appointed under the provisions of this section shall be citizens of the Territory of Hawaii."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes; I want to know the parliamentary status of that provision.

Mr. CULLOM. That was in the conference report.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That was agreed to in conference?

Mr. CULLOM. It was agreed to in conference.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Was it a conference amendment?

Mr. CULLOM. No; it was a House amendment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. And the Senate conferees receded from the disagreement of the Senate?

Mr. CULLOM. The Senate receded from its disagreement and agreed to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the further consideration of the report may be postponed? Is there objection?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator to one other provision, and that is with regard to the income tax. I notice that there is an amendment in the bill, apparently made in conference, which seems not to repeal the income tax heretofore in force in Hawaii.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not recollect certainly whether that is in or out of the conference bill. Where does the Senator find it?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I merely wish to call the Senator's attention to it. I do not care to——

Mr. CULLOM. I think it appears in some other class.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think you will find it on page 4 of the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I see it. My impression is that it is in again.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Somewhere else?

Mr. CULLOM. Somewhere else.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I just wished to call attention to that fact now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to postponing the further consideration of the conference report? The Chair hears none, and it is postponed.

Mr. HOAR. Until when?

Mr. CULLOM. Until——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request was that it should be postponed.

Mr. CULLOM. I said until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Notice has been given that——

Mr. HOAR. I do not want to interfere with the order of business by a mere trifling suggestion, but I remember once, in the other House, making a point that a conference report could not be indefinitely postponed under the peculiar rules that apply to that order of business, and it was sustained by Mr. Speaker Blaine, who held that it must be postponed to a fixed time.

Mr. CULLOM. I think it should be postponed until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It certainly can not be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest, therefore, that it be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply ask that it be postponed until to-morrow or to suit the convenience largely of the Senate before we take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report is postponed until to-morrow.

PROPOSED CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] proposes to address himself to, I think, the Alaska bill, and I find that there is a special order for 4.30. I rise to request that if there be any time remaining after the Senator from Tennessee concludes his remarks, before the special order is taken up, that we may proceed to the Pension Calendar and consider unobjected cases for fifteen or twenty minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension cases after the Senator from Tennessee has concluded his remarks, not interfering, however, with the special order at half past 4. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Alaska bill be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the bill known as the Alaska bill be laid before the Senate. Without objection, it is before the Senate.

CAROLINE WEINHEIMER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 3436) granting a pension to Catharine Weinheimer, returned to the Senate in compliance with its request.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the word "Catharine" is to be stricken out and "Caroline" inserted in the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; I move to strike out "Catharine," in line 11, and insert "Caroline."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Wherever it occurs in the bill? It occurs in another place.

Mr. COCKRELL. No. This is the case where the dependent and helpless child of a pensioned mother is to be pensioned, and this gives to the mother the additional pension.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 11, after the word "of," strike out the word "Catharine" and insert "Caroline."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any further amendment to be proposed?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is all.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VISITORS TO WEST POINT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. CARTER and Mr. HARRIS members of the Board of Visitors on the part of the Senate to attend the annual examination of the cadets at the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for the civil government of Alaska, and for other purposes.

Mr. BATE. The Senator from Nevada has a short paper which he wishes to have read.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Tennessee, who is about to speak, gives way that I may ask to have the paper which I send to the desk read. It is an affidavit in connection with this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the paper will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, City of Washington, ss:

John A. Dexter, being duly sworn, deposes and says: That I am an American citizen; 45 years of age; and was born in Richmond, Va. I have resided in Alaska for the past ten years. This is the first time I have left there during that time. My business in Alaska has been merchandising, having stations along the coast of Bering Sea, at St. Michael, Unalaklik, Norton Sound, Golofnin Bay, Cape Nome, and Fort Clarence. I established trading posts at these places with the Indians to buy furs. I have native agents at each of these places. I visited all of these points five or six times each winter in the course of my business. It was known from the first that there was gold along the shores of Bering Sea at various points, but it was not known that it was in sufficient quantities to pay for working until within the last two years.

There were several parties of prospectors fitted out at my store who went up and down the coast, but none of them found mines which they located previous to the fall of 1898. The first locators were Eric O. Lindblom, —— Hagaline, and Jaf Lindenburg. They got their supplies at my store and they told me they were going up the coast prospecting. After these three men went there first and made their locations they returned for more supplies. They shortly afterwards went back, taking with them Dr. A. N. Kittelsen, Gabriel W. Price, and a Laplander, Jo Hahn, who had declared his intention in April, 1898, before United States Commissioner Shepherd, to become an American citizen. These six men organized a miners' district and made rules and regulations in compliance with the laws of the United States. I knew them all well. They were all citizens of the United States except the Laplander, who had in good faith declared his intention to become such before a United States commissioner. They all made my stations their headquarters, and I knew all the Laplanders well. They were industrious, sober men, and said that they had come to make that country their home.

I went to Nome in November, 1898, and made some locations myself. Everything was proceeding orderly, and Dr. Kittelsen was the duly elected recorder. A large number of people came there during that winter and located claims. Mr. Price, one of the original locators and organizers of the district, who went there with the first party, notified the people of Council City, about 80 miles from Nome, that good diggings had been struck at Nome. Large numbers of people soon came over from Council City. Some of the emigration during the winter located claims for themselves and some jumped claims that had been located by the original parties who discovered the mines, on all sorts of pretexts, viz, that the notices were defective, the claims were not in proper shape or size, etc. There was nothing said for a long time about any of the original locators being aliens. Nearly all the jumpers were men who had been dealing with me for some time. Many who came to Alaska represented English and other foreign companies.

George Gardner was the agent of the English company, and as such grubstaked many of the jumpers at Cape Nome. The jumpers did no work on the claims because the original locators were in possession and would not allow them to enter on the claims. They simply recorded them in the recorder's office. I have seen the petition or memorial of the so-called "Law and Order League" of Council City. Nearly all the signers are Council City men, and most of them belong to companies sent out from London, Chicago, San Francisco, and other places to locate claims. I know that some of the signers of the so-called memorial belong to the English company represented by Gardner, and that many of them were foreigners who had declared their intention to become American citizens before the United States commissioner, Judge Shepherd, the same officer before whom some of the Laplanders made their declarations. I know these facts of my own knowledge, and have seen the grub-stake contracts between Gardner, agent of the alien company or syndicate, and the jumpers. A large number of the signers of the memorial or petition are aliens. If there was a "law and order league" in existence at Council City, Alaska, I never heard of it before I came to this city.

I do know that no such league ever existed at Cape Nome or ever assisted in maintaining the laws in Alaska. When navigation opened in the spring, about the last of June or the 1st of July, about two or three thousand people came into Nome. They declared that everything that had been done was illegal. They were a turbulent set of men, not miners, but many had the reputation of being professional agitators. They called a meeting to change the mining laws, after they had stationed men all over the district to relocate the claims after the meeting had abrogated existing locations. After the meeting assembled and its purpose was made known, Lieutenant Spaulding, of the Army, dispersed it to avoid what would necessarily have led to bloodshed if persisted in, because it was well known that the miners would not give up their claims without a fight. Lieutenant Spaulding told them that they must wait until the courts decided in their favor before they took possession of claims which other people had located.

JOHN A. DEXTER.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 20th day of April, 1900.

[SEAL] HARVEY T. WINFIELD,
Notary Public.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I thought I would have nothing to say in regard to the pending amendment because others who belong to the Committee on Territories, one of our largest committees, from which it has come, would address the Senate in regard to it and make such criticism upon this dangerous and forceful amendment as it deserves at the hands of one of our committee. I was particularly anxious that my friend the Senator from Vermont [Mr. ROSS], who had, by assignment, immediate charge of these sections, would discuss it. But it seems in the progress of the discussion that not a single member of this Committee on Territories, to which I belong, has seen fit to say a word about this matter except the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], who has the bill in charge and who now advocates this amendment.

Not a word has been said by any other member of the committee in regard to it. I apprehend that some Senators who are to vote upon this vital amendment may take up the idea that we approve and acquiesce in what has been said and done touching it by the Senator who has it in charge. Therefore it is that I am induced, at the request of some of my fellow-members of the committee, to say something of our course in the committee room touching the consideration of these two sections, 72 and 73, as well as others in the Alaska code bill.

I differ in toto with the Senator from Montana in regard to this amendment. I deem it those of us who differ with him as to this amendment to speak of our course in the committee room. While in the committee all these matters were freely discussed, as were all matters pertaining to this bill. I heard nothing whatever—and I do not know whether any of the others of the committee heard anything—adverse to the rights of aliens as embodied in sections 72 and 73 relating to the mining laws. Sections 72 and 73 of the bill were commented upon, no doubt, as other sections were, in our committee, and those sections were under the immediate supervision, correction, and direction of the able and distinguished lawyer and Senator from Vermont [Mr. ROSS].

After undergoing his special attention and criticism, they, as the other sections, were taken up by the committee seriatim and examined very thoroughly and criticised. There was no objection whatever, as I can now recall, made to them, and I was as much surprised as other members of the committee when an amendment came in the Senate doing away with sections 72 and 73 for the purpose alleged in the amendments now under consideration.

In order to understand it properly, Mr. President, let me tell you in a few words that this Alaska code bill was composed of more than 600 typewritten pages. It seems that it had been prepared by the commission for codifying the penal laws of the United States, composed of Messrs. Botkin, Watson, and Culberson, and was understood to have been taken, as far as practicable, from the code of the State of Oregon. When before the committee it was divided into four parts. The first to Senator CARTER, who now has it in charge; the second 150 pages to me; the third to Senator BEVERIDGE; the fourth, in which are these sections 72 and 73, was assigned to Senator ROSS.

As I said, if there was any objection raised to these sections, I can not recall it. The first attempt to amend this mining-law provision was by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], and it applied only to section 73; but, by way of further security against alien miners, the Senator from Montana, who had charge of the bill in the committee room, as he has here, offered an amendment and then substituted for it the one now under consideration, including both sections 72 and 73.

This amendment proposed as a substitute to the sections by the Senator from Montana is very comprehensively and adroitly written and presents a very attractive and innocent look; but when penetrated and read between the lines, ugly and dangerous features appear. There is, Mr. President, a serpent coiled beneath that rose; a dagger behind that smile. We ought to vote down these amendments and not encourage that unhappy influence which is calculated to destroy the rights of these interested parties, and not only of these parties, but the rights of other parties over this country.

It is true that in one sense this does not apply to the general domain of this country, but only to Alaska; but it is the principle involved in it which is so dangerous. The United States Congress has passed an act which gives all the rights that might be required by any miner in locating his claim or by any person in locating land; but in the law passed in 1897—and there is the rub—as late as 1897 this Congress has taken action, and it has given all the rights required by any party, native or alien. I will read that act first, and then I will read the amendment or substitute to show why we ought not to make this change.

In 1897, on March 3, Congress passed in regard to these mining claims a law of this kind:

> This act shall not be construed to prevent any persons not citizens of the United States from acquiring or holding lots or parcels of land in any incorporated or platted city, town, or village, or in any mine or mining claim in any of the Territories of the United States.

That act has been referred to very frequently in this discussion. It is an act limiting the power to enter these lands. There is an expression there that it shall not apply to mining districts. Therefore, as the matter stands, many of us believe that these two sections of the bill ought to remain intact, and we are perfectly satisfied with them as they are. But this is an attempt to repeal that law; not only to render it nugatory, but to repeal it absolutely in terms, and it is in substance, at least, proposed to be repealed by this amendment. What does this amendment say? I will first read section 72 as it stands in the bill and agreed to by the committee:

> SEC. 72. Any alien may acquire and hold lands, or any right thereto or interest therein, by purchase, devise, or descent, and he may convey, mortgage, and devise the same, and if he shall die intestate the same shall descend to his heirs; and in all cases such lands shall be held, conveyed, mortgaged, or devised, or shall descend in like manner and with like effect, as if such alien were a native citizen of the district or of the United States, etc.

That is section 72, and that in conjunction with the other section is now sought to be repealed by this amendment. This amendment has evidently been drafted by some fine Italian hand. It comes in here for consideration, and at first blush seems to be all right, but when you go to the bottom of it you find how destructive it would be to the rights of these miners.

Section 73, which is the one sought to be disposed of by the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, and which was approved by the whole committee, including the Senator from Montana, reads:

SEC. 73. The title to any lands heretofore conveyed shall not be questioned nor in any manner affected by reason of the alienage of any person from or through whom such title may have been derived.

Mr. President, those are the sections that passed our committee without objection and without other than favorable criticism, so far as I know. We all assumed that they were correct and we relied upon their containing nothing contrary to the statute of the United States and the interest of the country generally, and we heard nothing to the contrary until the proposition to amend was introduced. I suppose the Senator from North Dakota will tell us when he comes to speak on the amendment the reasons for its introduction. But it seems some influence has been at work seeking to have these statutes repealed and to establish this substitute in lieu thereof that was unknown to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BATE. Certainly, sir.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. What is the information the Senator from Tennessee desires?

Mr. BATE. The Senator can tell exactly how this came about. He presented it; it is his own bantling.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator seems to be naming it, however.

Mr. BATE. I have named it in a certain way as your bantling, and I think it deserves the characterization I have given it; but I know the Senator will make an explanation here, which no doubt will be satisfactory to him if not to the Senate. I assume so, at least, from the character and ability of the Senator; and I will give way now to the Senator if he wishes to explain how this came about, for it reverses in toto the unanimous action of the committee.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the Senator will be satisfied with my explanation when I make it.

Mr. BATE. I hope I may be, because I am not satisfied with the situation now, and I am opposed to this attempt to reverse the unanimous action of the committee upon what I regard the most vital point in the bill touching the interest of Alaska.

Here is an amendment, written, as I have said, by some fine Italian hand, which comes in here for the purpose of destroying these two sections. This is the second or third one that has come in. The one now pending is an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, as I understand it, in lieu of the one formerly presented by the Senator from Montana. It provides—

That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as changing the existing mining laws of the United States—

That is very good and satisfactory. Then it proceeds:

but in any suit, action, or proceeding hereafter commenced involving the validity of an unpatented mining location on the public domain any party alleging an interest in the subject-matter may put the competency of the locator in issue, and the court shall determine whether the locator was a citizen or had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States at the time the location was made.

Mr. President, that amendment, were it to become law, would take away the property from any man who has come to this country and not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, although he might have lived here twenty-five or thirty years of his life. His rights are to be disregarded and his property confiscated. That is what this means the disregard of rights and the confiscation of the property of foreigners.

It has been stated here, and truly stated, that, as the law now is, no one but the Government can interpose in these matters. This invites suits by any and every one. Where a foreigner has sold his claim, as I understand it, not only by the statutes but also by the decisions of the courts, he has the right to transfer title. It seems to have been the policy of the Government, and a wise one, to encourage alien miners to come here—men who are of a hardy, adventurous spirit—that they might find these mines, locate them, delve in them, and bring out the yellow and white metals.

That seems to have been the policy of the Government, and we have legislated to that effect and sought to do so in this bill. In 1897 there was a culmination of that progressive legislation favorable to miners in the statute which I read a few moments since. That statute shows that any foreigner can come here and locate and work mines without molestation. Let me say in this connection, that if this amendment is passed it will take right away and destroy the privileges of the miner, not only in the future, but also divest him of those rights which have already accrued.

I assume, Mr. President, that under existing laws when miners, native or alien, locate and work their claims they become vested rights and should not be disturbed by legislation. The effect, if not the design, of these amendments will be to disturb, if not destroy, all such holdings and rights under them as have been shown by testimony in certain cases referred to in this discussion. Through the court, under order of the Government, is the only way to interfere with these rights already accrued and in possession of these parties, and that is done by directing the Attorney-General to proceed to bring his suit in the name and by the authority of the Government against the parties, and when that is done it opens up the question of title and forces the man who either was a locator or the occupant or holder to deraign his title, and in doing so go back to the original locator. This the Government does not do, and hence the locator and worker of a mining claim is safe in his holding and title as the law is now. As I have said, this amendment, then, is intended to allow any person to sue and put the holder to the test of title, and if the holder of the claim in its beginning or subsequent was an alien it would void the title.

This amendment is, Mr. President [Mr. PETTUS in the chair], what you, as a lawyer, know is in the nature of a demurrer, a general fault-finder, and reaches back even to the original defect. It is a kind of pleading which takes away the rights of the original locator of the mine and destroys them. That is one of the objections to this amendment. If you propose to pass a provision on this subject, it should be prospective, and not retrospective and retroactive—not looking to the past, but to the future.

In that case, it would meet with some approbation, perhaps, and then the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] might sustain himself more consistently and with better reasons in the very inflammatory and enthusiastic speech he made here yesterday evening in a tirade against foreigners. There might then be some plausibility in it. Not while it is in its present form, retroactive, is it entitled to earnest consideration, and, I think, should be promptly defeated by the Senate. These rights are vested rights, and this amendment is a mere demurrer, seeking to reach back, and disturbs titles instead of quieting them. We should knock it out of Senatorial court, so to speak, and let the law remain as it is and as it has been indorsed and reported by this committee.

Of course there are some inducements—honorable inducements, I mean to say—that have been brought to bear in this Senate to have these amendments made, but it was not a question that was discussed or even thought of in the committee, and it has sprung up since the bill was reported. At any rate, it is here before us and we have to deal with it, and, in doing so, in my judgment, reviewing this case as briefly as I shall, is to let the bill remain as it was reported by the committee, as it was approved by the committee, and as it was approved by the Senator in charge of the bill who is now fighting it. He was instructed by the committee, so far as I know—I believe I was not present on that particular occasion—but I understand he was instructed to return the bill as the sense of the committee, and it has been so returned, and these two sections are in it, and I want to maintain them. I think it is right that we should.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the very section under consideration—section 73—was, I believe, a part of the work assigned to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BATE. No, sir.

Mr. CARTER. It was not?

Mr. BATE. No; as I stated a while ago, it was assigned to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. ROSS].

Mr. CARTER. I will ask the Senator from Tennessee, then, since the matter was not discussed in committee and attention was not called to it, if he believes that Congress should affirmatively ratify all the questionable titles in Alaska?

Mr. BATE. I do not think so.

Mr. CARTER. Section 73 does that very thing.

Mr. BATE. I do not think it could possibly have that effect, and could not have then been so regarded without attracting the attention of the committee.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Montana does not mean to say that that section would confirm all questionable titles in Alaska, does he?

Mr. CARTER. As to the alienage of the party holding the title?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BATE. Well, Mr. President, this is an omnium gatherum. It was so covertly written and so plausibly presented that I do not know exactly what it does contain. It seems to sweep all around, but, anyway, it strikes at these rights and strikes them down. So much, Mr. President, for the amendments.

A remarkable protest was presented here yesterday evening or the day before—it is not very long since, but I get mixed in these dates—it was rather surprising, and I must say it rather shocked me. It shows a condition up there that ought not to be permitted. I thought it was bringing a very severe criticism upon the commanding officer who was there, Lieutenant Spaulding.

There has been handed to me, however, by the Senator from Nevada, a paper which has just been read, which contains the statement of a Richmond gentleman, as I understand, who has been in business and is still engaged in business in Alaska; but he has been in Richmond recently, and came here yesterday and heard of the proceedings in regard to this matter. Being right from Cape Nome, he made the facts known. He knew some of these parties. He came to a Senator here, and hence this document was shown to me and read by the Clerk. He, Mr. Dexter, being vouched for as a reliable gentleman, his statement has rebuked into silence that remarkable protest.

We have heard talk about lobbyists here, Mr. President. I have seen none myself, and I assume that there have been none, except the men who have come here on business, and who had a right to do so, and we have had their assistance in the framing of this bill and in the correction of it. In this work we have had the assistance of two or three gentlemen of high character who live in Alaska. One of them, Mr. R. L. Lewis, I remember distinctly, and there were others here for the purpose of giving information as to the condition of things in their country, and they did so in a very lucid and very conclusive manner, and in many instances we have adopted their suggestions. I know I did myself in the part of the bill assigned to me.

That you may know the history of the bill I will say that it consists of over 600 pages of printed matter. That was divided, as I have said, by the chairman into four parts. There were four lawyers who happened to be upon that committee, and it was divided among them. I had a part, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. ROSS] had a part; the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], who is not now present, had a part, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] had the first part. In that way the bill was divided amongst us. We entered upon the work, and we thought we had corrected and rearranged the bill as well as it could be done. We had no lobbyists about the committee. The governor of Alaska was there by our invitation, and the other gentlemen to whom I have referred were also there upon our invitation, and they gave us a good deal of valuable information which we used to advantage.

I beg to further state, in regard to the memorial which was presented here yesterday, that it is a remarkable document signed by many men——

Mr. SPOONER. It was only signed by two men.

Mr. BATE. Of course at first blush we would say there was something wrong there and that these men, not knowing anything about them, were all right and that we should respect their utterances; but the gentleman to whom I have referred was here this morning, and he gives an explanation as to that. Those memorialists do not pretend to state anything upon their own knowledge, as I understand it. Here is the conclusion of what Mr. Dexter says, this gentleman who has made affidavits since some of these matters have been stated in the Senate. He says:

I have seen the petition or memorial of the so-called "Law and Order League" of Council City.

That is the one read yesterday.

Nearly all the signers are Council City men, and most of them belong to companies sent out from London, Chicago, San Francisco, and other places to locate claims. I know that some of the signers of the so-called memorial belong to the English company represented by Gardner, and that many of them were foreigners who had declared their intention to become American citizens before the United States commissioner, Judge Shepherd, the same officer before whom some of the Laplanders made their declarations. I know these facts of my own knowledge, and have seen the grub-stake contracts—

That is a new term to me. Grub-stake contracts—between Gardner, agent of the alien company or syndicate, and the jumpers.

I understand what "claim jumper" means. He had seen the contract between the jumpers and these men.

A large number of the signers of the memorial or petition are aliens. If there was a "law and order league" in existence at Council City, Alaska, I never heard of it before I came to this city.

I do know that no such league ever existed at Cape Nome or ever assisted in maintaining the laws in Alaska. When navigation opened in the spring, about the last of June or the 1st of July, about two or three thousand people came into Nome. They declared that everything that had been done was illegal. They were a turbulent set of men, not miners, but many had the reputation of being professional agitators. They called a meeting to change the mining laws, after they had stationed men all over the district to relocate the claims after the meeting had abrogated existing locations.

They had their men out ready to locate claims at once, as I understand it.

After the meeting assembled and its purpose was made known Lieutenant Spaulding, of the Army, dispersed it to avoid what would necessarily have led to bloodshed if persisted in, because it was well known that the miners would not give up their claims without a fight. Lieutenant Spaulding told them that they must wait until the courts decided in their favor before they took possession of claims which other people had located.

Mr. President, that is a very clear exposition of this matter, and it seems to me it thoroughly and effectively contradicts the memorial which was read here yesterday. I was myself very much surprised when the memorial was introduced. I was demoralized a little, so far as my prior convictions were concerned; but when I came to look at it, and see who were the people who had signed it, and found that they did not profess to state any of these things upon their own knowledge, I saw that it did not amount to much, and I came to the conclusion that we ought not to regard it.

But it was very shrewd upon the part of my fellow-Senators, with all respect to them, in managing their case, when they saw how the law had been presented here by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], both old miners and familiar with the mining laws, as well as with the miners' customs and how they get along generally under such circumstances; when that had been explained they should have allowed the matter to drop, for it put their case out of court. They seem to have felt that it was time to throw out a tub to the whale; and this memorial was sprung here yesterday as a tub to the whale to divert the attention of the Senate from the fact that retroactive legislation was here being urged. We have destroyed that tub by this affidavit of Mr. Dexter, if by nothing else.

Now, they say that these foreigners did not discover this gold. This man, whose affidavit has just been read here, states that these men were doing business with him. He had five or six stations, where he kept merchandise supplies along Bering Sea, and, among others, one at Cape Nome and at other places. He said that some men came to one of his trading stations and made known the fact that gold had been discovered in the Cape Nome district, when there was organized a force of six men, who went down there for the purpose of locating, and he gives the names of those; and without, I suppose, knowing anything about this memorial as it came here yesterday, the names he gives correspond exactly with the names of those given by Dr. Kittelsen, whose affidavit was read yesterday by the Senator from Nevada and who gives a clear exposition of this whole matter and gives the names of all the parties.

He, Dr. Kittelsen, is the man who was chosen in that camp as their recorder, and he did record all the claims of all these parties and those of the jumpers also. When those men came there, he was required to record their claims, and he did it.

This shows that six men went there, and Dr. Kittelsen, in his statement which was read here, also shows that six men went there. I believe two were Norwegians and one was a Laplander. They had all filed their intentions to become citizens of the United States, with one exception, before the same man, Sheppard, who was the commissioner who has been alluded to in this discussion, and before whom these applications were made at Council City. These foreigners had all applied to him, believing he had the right to take their declarations of intention to become citizens. Those Laplanders believed they had the right to go before him and take the oath of allegiance, and were so informed.

These men went there, made application, and took the preliminary steps to be made citizens of this country. That was the condition of the men who went there when they made locations. Before that they organized what is known as a miners' camp, of which you have heard much here, and if I understand it, practically the way they locate these claims—I do not know that I am correct in this, but such is my belief—one of them wants to locate a claim, whether a citizen or a foreigner, goes and drives down a stake at this and that corner, unless he has had it surveyed, and in the center sometimes a stake is driven down, and to that a piece of wood is attached, upon which he writes his name, and lets it be known that that is his location.

That was the condition of things there, and these, Mr. President, are the men who did this and whose claims were recorded. Even after two or three hundred more came there during the winter, there was no interference with or disturbance of what had been done, and there was no disturbance at all until long after, when two or three thousand more came in and wanted to regulate matters. Then this emeute sprang up, when this officer came in and suppressed it. So everything had been going on there in a quiet, lawful, and orderly way to secure the titles of these men.

Their locations had been worked according to the laws of the country. Some of them had turned out to be very fine locations, and two, three, or four had yielded an immense amount of gold; one, I understand, got as much as thirty or forty thousand dollars in one season, and another got a little more than $40,000. So it went on until presently the mine became so valuable that two or three men who had money to invest in such things, who led that character of life and were good judges of mines and mining claims, staked their money on their judgment, proposed to buy, and finally did buy up a part of these claims at a very high price.

A letter was read here at the opening of this discussion by the Senator from Nevada from one of the parties in interest, which shows that there has been about $90,000 paid there by one individual; and now a hundred thousand dollars or more is being used to carry machinery for the purpose of getting water over to the mines on the creeks. So you see what a hardship the adoption of these amendments would be to these men, and they would apply alike to all such in Alaska.

Meantime, Mr. President, Mr. A comes along as a locator; he is a foreigner, if you please; he locates some of these claims. There, then, is the recorder, Mr. B, and he records them. So far it is all right. Then, another man comes along, Mr. C, who has money, and he wants to buy. He proposes to purchase. He makes terms with Mr. A to buy at quite an advanced rate. That man then holds the title. That man is an old miner and he knows very well, as well as these other old miners here do, that no one but the Government can touch the claim of a foreigner, and the Government has never yet done it, so far as I have heard, and the statements here are all to that effect.

Therefore the purchaser felt secure in his title, even though a foreigner had located it, for he explicitly relied upon the law as it then existed and the decisions of the courts being carried out. He had no anticipation that there would be an effort made by anyone to come into the Congress of the United States and ask legislation which would upturn his rights and deprive him of his claim.

This man, Mr. C, purchased the property, and meanwhile this crowd of men came in. Then three lawyers appeared, one, I believe, of the name of Hubbard, of the firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume. They went there, and it seems as soon as they got there trouble began. They began to look into titles. They claimed that the locations of the foreigners were invalid, and then the jumpers proceeded to pounce upon those claims and attempted to sell them to somebody else. They are a character of people justly amenable to criticism and censure. They are aiders and abettors of jumpers and are as bad as the jumpers themselves.

Who are these jumpers? "Jumpers" is a bad term anyhow. You know how we all despise men of that character. My friends on the other side know how they despised the bounty jumpers during the war between the States. The word "jumpers" is associated with advantage taking and disreputable acts.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BATE. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. The Senator has evidently given much consideration to this question. He alludes to the question of jumpers. I desire to put a question to the Senator. Assuming that the laws of the United States make it a condition to a valid location of a mining claim that the locator be a citizen of the United States, or that he have declared his intention to become a citizen; if he does not comply with that condition his location is invalid and the land is the same as if it had not been located. Any citizen of the United States or person having declared his intention to become a citizen is, therefore, under the laws of the United States, entitled to make a valid location, because the first is wholly invalid. Now, does the Senator mean to characterize a person in the last situation I have mentioned as a jumper?

Mr. BATE. In the first place, I think the Senator's assumption is wrong, and I differ with him in regard to that title. I think the alien gets a temporary title, and it can be made a permanent title. This has been shown in this discussion where suits have been brought against foreigners to escheat their lands or mining claims, the Government declining to disturb the title and giving the alien the right to file his intention to become a citizen after suit is brought, and at any time before final decree, and upon such filing the proceedings are dismissed. The statute opens the courts to the foreigner and gives him the privilege, up to the last hour before the money is paid, of declaring his intention and making permanent his title.

Mr. STEWART. Let me answer that.

Mr. BATE. Let me get through. I will answer it further in a moment. I understand a jumper is a man who seeks to interfere with the title of the man with the pick and spade who has been there in the dust and cold, under the blasts of winter, in order to establish a claim. He is a man who has done no work whatever and goes there for the purpose of jumping a claim. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will allow me, having lived all my life in the midst of a mining country, I will give him what I understand to be the definition of a jumper accepted among miners. A man has made a valid location; he is entitled to make it under the law, and he is doing what he can to maintain it; he is complying with the law. A corporation or a combination of men enter upon possession of his mining claim by force, dispossess him of it, drive him away from it, proceed to operate it as if they had a right to it, contrary to law. Those are jumpers; but a man who enters lawfully—makes a location—never is a jumper.

I desire, further, to state that I understood the Senator from Nevada, and I did not quite understand the Senator from Colorado, to maintain that an alien could make a valid mining location. I have found no case in which it has been held that an alien can make a valid location. I called upon the Senator from Nevada to give me such a case, as I understood him to make such a statement. He referred me to a case in my own State. I want to call attention to the nature of the case in my own State.

Mr. STEWART. I simply want to say what a jumper is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada is out of order.

Mr. BATE. I yield to the Senator from Nevada to define a jumper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada is out of order. He can not speak without the recognition of the Chair.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BATE. I yield for him to define a jumper.

Mr. STEWART. A jumper is a man who enters upon a claim of another in his possession. I do not care whether he is a foreigner or whether he is an American. If he has located a claim and is working it and is in possession of it, the man who enters upon it to take it from him is a jumper, and is treated as such. Nobody has a right to take it from him, if he is a foreigner, except the Government of the United States, and according to the affidavit of Mr. Hubbard his clients are jumpers. He says that they went there and located these claims which had previously been located, and brought suit. Of course they were jumpers.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, the Senators who are familiar with mining and mining operations can better define jumpers than a layman like myself, but I will give my definition of it, the common-sense view of it. I look upon a jumper as a man trying to get something for nothing, who wants to interfere with the rights of the man with the pick and spade amidst the dust and blasts up there in the Arctic Circle, who is trying to make a living.

A jumper is a man who tries to oust him by coming in there and saying, "Your title is no good. Pay me so much money or I will bring suit against you and you will jump out." He is trying to get something for nothing by a species of blackmailing. Sir, in the animal kingdom we see that very frequently, and I think these jumpers might well be likened to the jackal. The jackal follows in the wake of the lion to get his prey. The lion destroys the game and the jackal comes along for the purpose of devouring it. That jackal is a jumper.

See an illustration that is perhaps more forcible, afforded in ornithology. Look at the cuckoo bird. Did anybody ever hear of the cuckoo making its own nest? No, sir. But whenever another bird makes a nest, the cuckoo bird comes along, takes the nest, lays its eggs, and hatches its young. That is an illustration of it, and that cuckoo is a jumper.

Mr. STEWART. That is good.

Mr. BATE. I have not very much time, and there are some things I wish to say. I shall have to yield the floor at half past 4 by prearrangement. This question of jumping has gotten to be a very serious one. They have a jumper on the side of this amendment, as the Senator from Nevada just told you. This man has jumped four or five thousand miles, all the way from Cape Nome, and lit down into the committee room of my friend the Senator from North Dakota, for the purpose of doing what? Why, of helping those jumpers who are at Cape Nome to take that which does not belong to them and put out the man with the pick and the spade and set up for themselves there and make a fortune out of his interest. That is a long jump and an adroit one.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BATE. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understood the Senator a while ago to say that he had an interview with a gentleman by the name of Lewis.

Mr. BATE. Yes, in the committee room, sir; and Senator Ross——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. Lewis informed me that he himself had prepared most of this civil-code bill, and that he was here in the interest of the parties who had taken an option on the claims alleged to have been located by these parties. Mr. Lewis is an attorney, and he is here on behalf of the other interest.

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir. He is here, and is an attorney by profession.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not dispute his right to be here.

Mr. BATE. Nor I.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Or to talk with the Senator.

Mr. BATE. Nor do I dispute the right of Mr. Hubbard to talk with you, but nevertheless I say he is a jumper, a good jumper, because he jumped four or five thousand miles in an incredibly short time and found himself in the committee room of a United States Senator. But Mr. Lewis is a good man. He is a good lawyer. He submitted a brief, and sent it to me the second day of this discussion, and that brief contains everything in the way of legal reference I have heard in regard to mining. He did it in two or three short pages.

Two or three of the leading cases referred to and analyzed with the facts. He is a fine lawyer and a modest, cultivated gentleman. We all were glad to have his suggestions in the committee room, which were given only when invited.

These foreigners are the parties who first found the gold there. They were the adventurers. What was the condition of things at Cape Nome when gold was discovered there? We knew nothing about it.

It is said here in a part of the proof touching this matter that a few months before they learned of this discovery it had been told somebody in confidence, and they had made it known; had violated their confidence. It was, however, lost and forgotten; at least, no effort had been made to develop it. This was in the spring when, as Mr. Dexter states, the company was to go and organize a camp in the fall, and up to that time nothing had been done to establish a camp or make a location. It stood just in that relation. And these six men organized the first camp and made the first location of mining claims there. If ever claimed by anyone else, the claims had been abandoned.

Mr. President, I believe that it is said that the Norsemen discovered America before Columbus did; but Columbus really discovered it. He is the man to whom we are indebted for it. His discovery brought practical benefit with it. The Norsemen may have seen it first on the coast of Iceland, but it was not followed up, and was lost and forgotten. So these people may have heard of Cape Nome and the gold, yet they paid no attention to it; but months after that here comes these men with the pick and spade, and they go over and find it and they locate and develop it. It belongs to them, and it would be an outrage upon the part of the Government of the United States to take it away from them or from those who hold under them.

I have gone somewhat over this matter. There are a great many more points in it, but I do not intend to detain the Senate to-day after half past 4. I desire the ceremonies to begin then as we have agreed. But I want to say that as a member of this committee I have looked at this a little more narrowly, perhaps, than if I had not been a member of the committee, for I felt a pride naturally that our committee should do what is right, and I know, furthermore, that Senators rely upon committeemen for information coming under their investigation more than upon their own observation and their own examination in matters that come before the Senate. I felt that there was a moral obligation resting upon me as a member of the Committee on Territories to give my ideas about this and to do the best I could touching this bill.

This is a large bill, a very remarkable bill, and it has been conducted on this floor by the manager who has had it in charge with very marked ability and success. He has not only shown astuteness and adroitness in this matter, but he has shown eloquence when it was necessary to denounce foreigners. I think I could afford to do it as an ex-Confederate—you and I, Mr. President [Mr. PETTUS in the chair]. But when one-third of the men shooting us down in our late war were foreigners, I do not think those who enlisted them to do it ought to abuse them. I think they ought to take care of those who fought with them to sustain the Federal Government and to overcome us Confederates in the fight. I think the Senator from Montana should not indulge his bitter tirade upon them to such an extent.

Mr. President, this amendment destroys the rights of those who have gone to Cape Nome in good faith, made their locations according to law, and have sold the locations in good faith; and others have invested a large amount of money there, and when you pass this amendment, destroying these two sections, you destroy their property; you take it away from them. It amounts to nothing but confiscation upon the part of the Government of the United States, and I am against that kind of a proceeding.

I am against it in morals as well as in law. The law is on the side of our contention. The morals are upon that side. The man who located it sold it. Another man bought it in good faith. Now he holds it and is trying to better it, and to carry money there to add to it and help this country, and he is doing it on a liberal scale.

The foreigners found the gold at Cape Nome. What was the condition of things? To me it looks almost like an apparition, a wonderful thing in itself. Two years ago there was a cold, bleak, barren, uninhabited, and unattractive country at Cape Nome. Not a sail fluttered in its borean blasts; not a steam stack belched forth its cloud of smoke. No commerce, no trade; naught to be seen but a shipless sea and the rock-ribbed mountains frowning upon it. Now we see thrift and trade in season, and active, thrifty, stirring population, with pick and spade, digging, even in the sands of the sea, for gold. How comes this gold in the ocean? I have been racking my brain to see what is the most plausible theory.

How come these gold nuggets in the ocean, down in the sands, where the water has been washing over them for centuries? It is said, I believe, that the most plausible idea is that the intense internal fires have made the gold of some coarser material and cast it up along with the rock, the upheaval of which makes the mountains.

We must look at time not as we have it in the Bible—I do not dispute the Bible—but as of thousands and perhaps millions of years. This abrasion, the beating of the sea against this gold-bearing mountain, has been going on and on. These waters have been beating against these rock-ribbed hills, now and then washing out these little particles of gold, and they have dropped into the sands, where the miners find them. That was the condition when these foreigners went there, these enterprising men from Lapland.

I think that was fortunate, and it is the first time I ever thought it a good investment for the Government to send for the Laplanders and pay the amount of money we had to pay. They have come, and with their energy they have gone to Cape Nome and they have discovered these mines, and now you see how it is working, and the amount of gold it is bringing forth. They came with their reindeer. They are adapted to that climate. So is the reindeer. Nature is beautiful in its adaptability. The reindeer is adapted to that cold, unproductive climate. He feeds and fattens upon the native moss. His skin is thicker, his hair is longer and softer, and there is a little fine wool next to his skin to keep him warm. They use his skin for garments to keep warm the inhabitants of that bleak and uncongenial climate.

Another thing occurs to me in this connection. The finest and most costly material known to the Gobelin looms or to handmade product comes from the arctic regions. It is the down of the eider duck. Nature is adaptable, and it prepares these things to suit the necessity. So those Lapps came to Alaska, promising, before they came, to become citizens of the United States. They came and did the very best they could to become citizens. Twenty-seven of them filed their affidavits of first intention in Port Townsend. The others made application when they went up there before authorities whom they thought were authorized to give certificates of citizenship.

Now, I am glad those men came with their reindeer. They may develop a useful industry up there; I do not know; but one thing is certain, that these Laplanders can live there and live there successfully, where our people could not survive—a place where the sun is never vertical, but gives its horizontal rays in long days and cold and darkness in long and dreary nights. No warmth to melt the ice-bound brook and the snow-covered vale or to bring forth fresh and green vegetation or to give blush to the rose.

These Laplanders, Swedes, and Norwegians are peculiarly adapted to that country, and they can bring it into a rich development. They can make a useful country of it when we could not. Our people go there merely to stay three months, and are as migratory as the cranes who fly over us, going forward and backward with the seasons. That is the character of our people who go there.

They would go there in the summer time for three months, while these Lapps can stay there all the time and they can develop the resources of the country and pour any amount of gold into the pockets of our people. Therefore, we ought to encourage them instead of turning them out upon a cold technicality of law. We ought to let them have their equities; and this case is full of equities. It would be unfair, unjust, illiberal, and, I think, inequitable for us to put this amendment in lieu of the two sections which I have read and which have been agreed upon by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). The hour of half past 4 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. BATE. I am not through, but I will quit.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE DANFORD.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I ask that the resolutions from the House of Representatives on the death of the late Representative DANFORD may now be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 20, 1900.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of the Hon. LORENZO DANFORD, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask for their present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. LORENZO DANFORD, late a Representative from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid to his eminent public services and high personal character.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, it is the custom to take formal note of the decease of our colleagues, and it is usual in such connection to speak only words of eulogy.

The circumstances of death and the proprieties of such occasions are calculated to restrain and qualify all that may be said.

For this reason our tributes too frequently have less weight and make less impression than they should. It is not necessary to have any such thoughts in this instance. The unrestrained truth is in this case the highest eulogy; and if it were not so, he whom we honor to-day would, if able to have a wish, infinitely prefer it to any false compliments.

LORENZO DANFORD was born on a farm in Belmont County, Ohio, October 18, 1829. At the age of 25 years he had attended the common schools, spent two years at college, graduated in the law, and been admitted to its practice, where his advancement was rapid.

In the six years following he had acquired a clientage, attracted the favorable attention of the public, been twice chosen prosecuting attorney of his county, and had turned his back on all the bright prospects that thus attended him to enlist as a private soldier in the Union Army.

His service was at the front, where he made a record for gallantry in battle that brought its reward in one promotion after another, until finally he was made a commissioned officer, and later attained to the rank of captain.

At the close of the war he resumed the practice of his profession, in which he soon became so distinguished that he was tendered employment in almost every case of importance in his judicial district. His great success was due to the fact that, in addition to being well grounded in the law and having great power as an advocate, he had preeminent good common sense and a familiar knowledge of human nature. He seemed to comprehend intuitively the motives of men, and thus was able to unravel transactions and discover and establish the truth.
